We solicit the kind attention of our friends to the need which exists of increasing the subscription list of THE TRUTH SEEKER. There are several reasons for this, which our readers will readily see. First, It will do a world of good, by making more Liberals and by interesting those already liberal in the work of Freethought. The church is making great encroachments upon our liberties, and the people need to know about it, in order to defeat its tyranny. And those who read THE TRUTH SEEKER are a hundred times more interested and activ than those who do not. Second, It is a duty we owe to our fellow-men to giv them the light of reason we hav obtained. Liberalism makes for true civilization, and freedom from fear of an angry God makes men happier and better. Every Liberal should do all he can to lift up his neighbors from the darkness of superstition to the glorious plain of mental liberty. And, as Mr. Wakeman says, referring to the resolution regarding the Liberal papers passed at the late International Congress: "They are the very life of the cause of intellectual and practical emancipation of the people. As such they are to be built up and sustained by constant care, payment, encouragement, and solicitation for subscribers for them." Third, An increase in the list will relieve the readers from the occasional "duns" we are compelled to send out in order to get money with which to pay bills. If we can obtain two or three thousand new subscribers, the increased revenue will make the business work of the paper easier, and we can continue to improve the paper without fear of financial embarrassments.

To reward those who will do a little for us in this matter we hav arranged to take a large number of Mr. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," and to every one who sends us four new yearly subscribers at the regular rates of $3 ($12 in all), we shall send a copy of that magnificent work free. Those who send the club before the book is on the press will be enrolled among the original subscribers and patrons in the book.

And to make it easy to get these four new subscribers we will offer them as a premium either of two splendid works—The "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated," or W. S. Bell's "Handbook of Freethought" in cloth binding Our readers know the value of these books, and that about every Liberal in the country would like a copy of one of the other. Either one of these, as may be chosen, will be given to the new subscribers obtained in these clubs of four, and a copy of "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" to the one who gets up the club and sends the money and names.

We cannot afford to make this premium to single subscribers, but to enable old subscribers and single new subscribers to obtain these and other desirable works at a great reduction, we hav made a list of premiums in connection with subscriptions to the paper, to be found in the first column of the first editorial page of THE TRUTH SEEKER. We are willing to do our part toward making the obtaining of good Liberal works easy and cheap, and hope our readers will take advantage of the terms offered.

Once more we ask that a favorable eye be turned in our direction, and a helpful hand extended. As the resolutions of the International Congress expressed it, Boom the Liberal papers and you boom the Liberal cause.

"A special committee of the Wilmington, Del, city council has reported favorably a bill, drafted by the board of police commissioners, which makes it unlawful for any girl under seventeen years of age" to be present at any public place of amusement after 8 o'clock in the evening. And this regardless of the consent or presence of her parents. Here in New York a girl under sixteen cannot take part in a performance at a theater, even if her parents are anxious to hav her do so, if one Gerry, a fidgety old bigot, objects. We are a high spirited and free people. We must be, for the ancestors of some of us once threw some very good tea into the Atlantic.

"True Christian prudence makes us submit our understanding to the maxims of the gospel without fear of being deceived. It teaches us to judge things as Jesus Christ judges them, and to speak and act as he did."—St. Vincent de Paul.

For "Christian prudence" read Christian credulity. The amendment is in the interest of accurate expression. What Christian is there to-day who is willing to judge things as Jesus judged them and to submit his understanding to the maxims of the gospel? Who that does not want to commit suicide will drink prussic acid or submit to being bitten by a rattlesnake or copperhead? Who will giv to the thief his overshoes to keep company with the stolen patent leathers or turn the unsmitten cheek to the tramp, if there is a policeman within call? Go to, good Christian friend, and quit talking nonsense. You may be sincere, but nobody not similarly afflicted can repress the suspicion that you are posing for effect.

The Charity and Organization Society of Buffalo seems to be run in the interest of Protestantism. A Pole, one Jos. Antoszewski, writes to the Baptist Record of that city as follows:

"In the Polish mission we can say that God has blessed us the past three months. I was able to preach the gospel and by some gifts of benevolence to show the practical fruits of the gospel. I was able to giv to many needy persons provisions, clothing, and coal. The Charity and Organization Society engaged me to assist in their work. I was able to help the poor by money they furnished and to secure work for the unploymed"

This Antoszewski is a Protestant missionary among his Catholic fellow countrymen, which is all right, of course, but just why he is permitted to employ public funds or charity funds to buy converts for his particular kind of Christianity, does not appear. It will be noted that this gentleman quietly assumes that benevolence is one of the fruits of the "gospel," as though there were no benevolence before the birth of the writers of the New Testament books or where the Bible has not molded the ideas of the people. Christianity is indeed "The Claimant," although, like some other noted pretenders, it has no standing in court.

Freethought and Secular Notes from England.

SKEPTICISM IN THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

A Roman Catholic theologian, who sometimes writes in the Contemporary Review, is affected evidently by the skepticism of the age, for he has just made a vigorous attack upon the Pope and the Bible. It is well, perhaps, for the writer's sake, that he preserves his anonymity, otherwise he would probably very soon hav to share the fate of Mr. St. George Mivart. The battle recently fought by Dr. Clifford and Mr. John Urquhart over the alleged inerrancy of the Bible is now fought over again by this writer, who, while acknowledging the the authority of the Pope, takes shelter under the protection of the fact that a papal encyclical is not a binding definition ex cathedra and therefore is not exempt from criticism. Certainly this critic does not spare the Pope, who has so hastily condemned the higher criticism. All who hav any knowledge of biblical criticism in England and Scotland are aware that opinion among experts is so overwhelmingly in favor of the modern school of critics that it is impossible to find a competent scholar ready to maintain the narrow orthodox view. This writer declares that it is the same in the church to which he belongs, for he says:

I am myself acquainted with Catholic divines who, having devoted the best years of their lives to the study of the Bible, for the sole purpose of employing their knowledge in defense of strict orthodoxy, found themselvs compelled to indorse the very propositions which they had set out with the intention of refuting. This is why the serious study of the scriptures is tabooed by our Catholic theologians, and will hav to be wholly prohibited in time.

The writer acknowledges that his difficulties are greatly increased by the publication of the Pope's encyclical. Hitherto this devout Catholic has had to believe only in an infallible church, which some of them found, it appears, to be not at all easy; but now they are bidden also to believe in the infallibil ity of a book which says that Aaron was buried in two different places; that Elijah sent a Jewish king a writing after he was dead, and which in one place says that God tempted David to do a certain thing, and in another place that Satan tempted him to do it. The Catholic writer in the Contemporary Review objects, as a Christian, to be bound to accept the orthodox view of the Bible while it is so contradictory in its statements. He therefore, in spite of the Pope, believes in the "Higher Criticism."

SECULAR PROGRESS.

Seventy years ago Robert Owen was deemed by certain employers of labor a lunatic for proposing that the working hours of factory laborers should be reduced from sixteen to twelve hours a day. Increasing the possible comforts or lightening the burden of the toiling millions was not then recognized as a part of the orthodox faith of either laymen or clergymen. At the present time, however, England is ringing with praise of the successful experiment of an "eight hours' day" for work. Many Freethinkers twenty years ago were considered the bitter enemies of the employers for suggesting that nine hours of labor should constitute a day's work. Secularists never could accept the doctrin that the whole duty of man consisted in slaving with his hands and in fearing God and obeying the king. Believers in free minds hav always taught the necessity of freedom of bodies. Hence we rejoice that the nation is becoming converted to the Secular view of life.

A NEW SECULAR FORCE.

I hav frequently pointed out what a power for good the pulpit might become if it were used to expound scientific and economic questions concerning every-day life. At last this useful course is to some extent being adopted in England. Bishops, clergymen, and ministers are now dealing Sunday after Sunday with the labor and other social problems which demand solution. Of course the cause of this "new departure" is obvious enough. The church needs the patronage of the working men, and therefore the clergy feel compelled to deal with those social subjects that their predecessors ignored. Still, we, as Secularists, need not trouble about the motivs in this case, if the evils are admitted and remedies for them are publicly discussed. Anything is better than the mystification of the public mind with theological conundrums, and the neglect of the mundane affairs of existence.

MORE CONVERSIONS.

The barefaced fiction of "The Converted Shoemaker" is not to be allowed to hav all the running. A pious saint has published a score of names of those who are said to hav been converted to Christianity from Freethought. The unfortunate point, however, for the saint is, that most of the names he mentions are entirely unknown to the Secular party. Those unprejudiced people who are familiar with the enormous figures used in describing the armies of the Lord in the Old Testament will not be surprised that his ministers to day should indulge in reckless exaggeration. It is a way they hav, for is it not all for the glory of God? Does not St. Paul say, "For if the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory; why yet am I also judged as a sinner?"

A VICTIM OF SCOTCH BIGOTRY.

The Rev. William Robertson Smith, who recently died, was a victim some years ago of the bigotry of pious Scotland. In 1878 he was made Professor of Hebrew in the Free Church College at Aberdeen, and there he became the victim of a heresy hunt. Certain articles which he had contributed to the "Encyclopedia Britannica" roused the fervid orthodoxy of the highland host, as the more conservativ and Calvinistic of the Scotch Free Church ministers are known. They summoned him before the general assembly of his kirk, and the debates were long and exciting. After a brilliant defense Dr. Smith was removed from his office. In 1881, the year of his dismissal, he joined the late Dr. Baynes in the editorship of the Encyclopedia, in which the offending articles had appeared. He was one of the ablest advocates of what is called the higher criticism of the books of the Old Testament, and especially of the Pentateuch. It is asserted as a settled point which no fairly well informed man with unprejudiced mind ever calls in question that the Pentateuch, or rather Hexateuch (for the book of Joshua is commonly included), in its present form, is not an original composition, but a compilation, consisting mostly of extracts from at least three different sources; and that the compilation was made many centuries after the time of Moses. This belief has become, or is rapidly becoming, one of the commonplaces of every-day opinion; and Dr. Robertson Smith was, if not latterly, the most prominent, certainly the most powerful instrument in accomplishing this momentous result; for momentous it will probably prove to be in more ways than one. The Christian scriptures are built upon the Jewish; and the character and authority of these latter cannot undergo a change without changing also the Christianity which rests upon them or is developed from them.

THE MAHATMAS TO THE FRONT.

Mrs. Besant has returned from India just in time to take part in a rupture among the Theosophists. It seems that in the theosophical circles in India, some vague charges had been floating as to the attitude of Mr. Judge, the vice-president of the Theosophical Society, toward the "masters." Mrs. Besant brought these rumors to the official notice of Colonel Olcott, the president, and the colonel incontinently gave Mr. Judge the alternativ of resigning the vice presidency or demanding a committee of inquiry. In his haste, however, Colonel Olcott is said to hav neglected the forms of procedure laid down in the constitution of the society, and Mr. Judge, supported by the European and Indian secretaries, urged this neglect warmly against him. The quarrel, though turning on points of constitutional form, really involves the question whether the society as such shall affirm or deny the existence of mahatmas On this profoundly interesting point the society has hitherto expressed no opinion, for the best of reasons; some of its members believe in the "masters;" others do not; and a dogmatic pronouncement would be the signal for a perilous schism. Colonel Olcott wrote in haste. He will probably repent at leisure. His procedure against the vice-president offends not only against the constitution of the society—his own constitution—but against the most elementary notions of judicial fairness. In any case the mutual recriminations of the Theosophist officers are furnishing sport for the Philistines.

A NECESSARY PROSECUTION

There are several theological tramps, supported by certain religious bodies, going through the country defending Christianity and attacking Secularism. Were this done by respectable and intelligent men who were acting truthfully according to their lights, there could be no objection to it. But these theological tramps seem to be destitute of all decency and the ability to tell the truth. One of these depraved exponents of the orthodox faith has several times publicly made a charge of the most obscene character against the conductors of the London Hall of Science, and as the filthy libel has been printed and widely circulated, it has been resolved to commence a prosecution against the publisher of this foul charge. Probably in my next "Notes" I may be able to giv further particulars about the matter. It is quite time that a stop was put to such a degrading mode of Christian advocacy.

INTERESTING ITEMS.

The Rev. Holden Sampson has just been the victim of church intolerance. The reverend gentleman, it appears, has been somewhat too outspoken on social questions and too liberal in his interpretation of biblical teaching to suit the purse-holders of the church, and he has accordingly been forced to resign. Incidents of this kind deserve the fullest publicity. A church that claims to be national has no right to expect its acts of bigotry to be hidden under a bushel.

In spite of the superstitious opposition to cremation the seventh issue of the transactions of the Cremation Society of England shows continued steady increase in the number of practical converts. In the year 1885 three bodies were burnt at Woking, and for the following eight years down to the present time, the yearly numbers hav been 10, 13, 28, 46, 54, 99, 104, 101. Last year looks, at first sight, like a decrease, but Manchester has now established a crematorium, and thirty bodies cremated there would otherwise probably hav been added to the Woking total.

The "Church Schools Sunday," on which, in response to a request from the bishop of London, collections were made last December on behalf of the church schools in London, seems to hav been rather a failure. One hundred and fifty-four churches collected £873 between them—less than £6 apiece. The London Diocesan Magazine regretfully refers to the £30,000 raised in the churches on Hospital Sunday, and thinks that £5,000 "toward the preservation of church schools is not too much to expect." The bishop is going to make another attempt in July.

A return for the Education Department states that the expenditure for public education in England and Wales in 1893 was £6,394,152, an increase over the previous year of £428,636.

"Christian" England has very little faith in its God as a source of protection, for, according to the official returns of parliament, the country has to spend every year from £53,000,000 to £58,000,000 for the defense of the empire. CHAS. WATTS.

Random Notes.

Here is a good story. A French bishop was invited to dinner at a cardinal's in Rome. "Where is your bishopric?" asked the cardinal. "In Angouléme." The cardinal looked as intelligent as if the bishop had explained the Trinity mystery to him. "Department of Charente," added the bishop. No more light was visible. Suddenly a bright idea struck the bishop. "I am bishop in Cognac," said he, "my diocese lies in Cognac." "Ah, Cognac, Cognac," cried all the guests, "that must be a heavenly place in which to be bishop."

"To tax church property is to tax God," says the Catholic Review, and adds no comment to its solitary epigram. Let us see. Then to rent church property is—what? To sell church property is—what? To insure church property is—what? To mortgage church property is—what? To hold a raffling fair in church property is—what? The epigram has more bray than brains.—American Sentinel.

There is no proof on record of a prayer ever having been answered, and yet there are at this moment a million human beings on their knees in the dirt asking God to do a million different things, which in their opinion should be done at once, and which he will not do.

Some inquisitiv and sacrilegious people may wonder why God did not want Eve to know she was naked; but it is none of their business—"God's ways are not as our ways"—he was not civilized.

It was God and not the devil who said to "the woman," "I will greatly multiply thy sorrow," etc. Women will crawl on their knees in the dirt for him, and yet they want to vote.

News and Notes.

Thursday, May 10th, under a beautiful sky, all the glory of spring around, with Dr. E. B. Foote Sr., I visited the monument of Thomas Paine at New Rochelle, which is now in process of being renovated, the name and the noble sentences of the great reformer shining forth in gold. I look forward to a grand celebration at this place on Decoration Day, when the improvements will be fully completed, and amidst flowers and music the memory of Thomas Paine will be illustrious. This is a delightful place for a gathering of this sort. There are lovely scenes about, the trees branching in leafy garniture, the gentle hills stretching away from the intervale, and sunshine and shadow mingling on the luminous grass. Here one can dream of great things, of the heroic past, and here one can gather inspiration for future work. Here nature mingles her glory with the hopes and toils of man. Amidst her music and grand and beautiful forms is the monument of man's noble endeavor to be consecrated in the undying memory of the race. May the multitudes flow to this spot and rekindle the fires of freedom.

Friday evening, May 11th, I again confront the Liberal Club, which I always like to do, for it generally appreciates one if he tries to do his level best. My subject was "Liberty and Authority," and on this occasion my critics did not seem to differ very widely from my fundamental principles. I find rather more accord there than I expected. If we agree on first principles, the question of method must be settled by human experience. The political principles of Paine and Jefferson are those most generally adopted by Freethinkers, in fact, if there is to be any government at all in the world without tyranny these principles must be adopted.

I gave the same leture before the Brooklyn Philosophical Association, and it was received in the same spirit as at the Liberal Club, that is, the differences were simply as to methods and not as to principles. While many Freethinkers are Socialistic, and would enlarge the powers of the government, they would, as Mr. Wakeman expressed it, bring in the voluntary principle and diminish the compulsory. If there is Socialism in the future it must be secular and scientific, and not religious. We hav had enough of religious and paternal Socialism. All Freethinkers must oppose that, for in it are the seeds of the tyrannies of the past. The state is not over the people, but it is merely an agency in the hands of the people for certain purposes, and beyond those purposes its functions must cease. The state cannot in any event be made universal as human society itself. As Paine points out, the state is only a function of society, and not society itself. It is a part of society, as the eye is a part of the body; and the body itself is far greater than any particular function of itself; so human society in its manifold powers and developments is far higher, profounder, and vaster than the state itself, which is not the life of society but simply its police force.

These principles were elucidated after my lecture before the association by Henry A. Stone, Joseph Warwick, and others, and especially by the president, Henry Rowley, who is always fully equal to the subject under discussion. I always wish, when I hear Rowley, that he was out in the lecture field stirring up the people with his splendid matter and delivery, for he has that way of expressing his ideas which not only informs but arouses. As president of the Brooklyn Philosophical Association he is doing a great work, and will surely become one of the best known exponents of our cause, as he is to-day one of our most brilliant platform speakers.

A very interesting phase of my subject, "Liberty and Authority," came up both before the Liberal Club and Brooklyn Association—namely, compulsory vaccination, which it seems to me must be opposed both on Freethought and scientific grounds. I also attended a meeting with Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., which he addressed, and which was a pretty vigorous protest against this sort of tyranny. However, some Freethinkers are in favor of compulsory vaccination; but I am of the opinion that when the subject is fully discussed and understood the fallacy and the wrong of it will be admitted by those who are without prejudice.

It is a matter beyond dispute that compulsory vaccination has caused the death of several individuals in Brooklyn; that is, innocent persons hav been poisoned to death in order to insure the safety of the rest of the community.

It is a question as to whether criminals ought to be killed for the sake of the security of society. Some argue against capital punishment even for the murderer. But in this case not criminals but innocent people are executed for the sake of society. Is not this orthodox vicarious atonement? We protest against Christ dying for us. How about having little children poisoned and killed for our good? Is that justice?

Even if vaccination really secured the safety of society, is it not a question as to whether it should be compulsory?

What is the ground for compulsory vaccination?

This, of course: that vaccination is a certain preventiv of small-pox. This can be the only ground of compulsion. But if vaccination is a certain preventiv, then those who are vaccinated are safe anyway and are not in danger from the non-vaccinated.

Where, then, is the reason for forcing the non-vaccinated against their own judgment to be vaccinated, since this does not conduce to the safety of the vaccinated? For the vaccinated are already safe, being vaccinated! If vaccination does not make one safe, then vaccination is a humbug and, of course, should not be compulsory.

On either horn of the dilemma compulsory vaccination must go by the board. If vaccination insures safety, then the vaccinated cannot enforce vaccination on the non-vaccinated on the ground of protection, for they are already sufficiently protected by their own act. If vaccination does not insure safety, then we are confronted by the preposterous claim that the state has a right to force upon the community an uncertain remedy.

This question goes so deeply into the principles of government that it is well to understand these fallacies of compulsion. It is like forcing religion upon the community, and if one is justifiable, then the other is equally so. If not, why not?

The Philosophical Association is making grand preparations for the Paine festival at New Rochelle, Decoration Day. It looks as if there would be a great throng present, and every Freethinker who can possibly attend should do so. It will be a rare day—one of a thousand. Let it be enshrined with the great memories of the republic. Let it be a white day amidst the toils of reform. Let it be a gala day for humanity and progress.

I hav arranged to be at Albany when the Constitutional Convention comes together again May 22d. On Sunday, May 27th, I shall lecture at Van Vechten Hall, 119 State street, afternoon and evening. I hope that every Freethinker in the vicinity of Albany and Troy will be present, that we may make a vigorous protest for human rights. Now is the time to do our level best; and we must work together.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

"Four Hundred Years."

The days of grace are now very few. Those who wish to get their names into "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" should let us know at once. Names and $5's are coming in quite encouragingly, but there are some pledged ones still without the gates, and a large number of others who, we surmise, intend to come in at the eleventh hour. Well, that hour has struck. Do not forget that $6.50 secures THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year and a copy of Mr. Putnam's book, which contains more than eight hundred and fifty pages of reading matter, one hundred and fifty portraits, and the names of all who hav paid in advance for the book. Observations.

A reporter of a daily paper, who as a tramp recently invest gated the workings of a charitable organization in this city, is surprised to find that it is conducted on business principles—that is, the managers hav regular office hours; the destitute are not relieved until they hav earned their food, and tickets of admission are procurable only from clergymen. It is probable that this institution is a type of all organized charities, which are not charities in the true meaning of the word. They are business concerns, which make commerce of the misfortunes of mankind, and the palatial quarters in which their offices are located testify to the remunerativ qualities of the business.

Colonel Breckinridge discovers that the Bible is a very prolific source of defense and excuse for his lately exposed line of conduct, while the clergy sometimes find that the Kentucky Congressman furnishes them a convenient illustration in the expounding of biblical truth. In his address to his constituents the colonel compares himself to King David, who, though like him a sinner, found favor with the Almighty; and a Southern minister, desiring that his flock should hav a better idea of the character of King Solomon, lately remarked that this wisest of men was "a regular Billie Breckinridge." Thus do the ancient and modern saints serve as a complement to one another and powerfully aid in achieving a comprehension of divine truths.

The Rev. Dr. Parkhurst, head of the Society for the Encouragement of Meddling with Other People's Business, has expressed himself on the subject of woman suffrage. His advice to women is that they remain "womanly" and not strive to be "mannish," which is like admonishing an aunt not to usurp the functions of an uncle; but what would become of Parkhurst's moral crusade if he should conclude to act like one of the male sex instead of fussing about like a prudish old maid? Granting that politics has a coarsening influence on women, it is not plain that familiarizing them week after week with the depravity of the outcast members of their sex can serve to promote their modesty and refinement. On the whole, the associations of the polling booth, corrupt as they are, can make some pretensions to decency compared with the influences of Parkhurst and his society for the elevation of immorality to the dignity of a political issue.

This column is indebted to Mr. J. K. Ingalls for the following draft of a dialog showing how bank control of the currency affects the citizen:

HAYSEED AND GOLDMAN.

FARMER HAYSEED: Here's a note for $1,000 guaranteed by Deacon Jones. Want money on it for a considerable spell.

BANKER GOLDMAN: Well, that's what we call "gilt-edged." Will giv you $939 50 in our notes for your individual note for $1,000, payable in one year; we keeping the guaranteed note as security. Sixty dollars is the discount for one year, and fifty cents for the three day's grace.

F. H.: Whew! Never hear'n tell 'tyou bank fellows had any grace to grant Don't see where it comes in either. You take pay for it a year in advance without waiting to see whether it is wanted or no. But, say, I want the credit for twenty years. How much mought be then the mis—*dis*count?

B. G.: H'm. Well, 'twould be $1,200.50. But we don't discount notes having that long to run.

F. H.: I should say not. Let's see. I would pay you down $200.50 and $1,000 when the note was due without ever having from you a measly red. Don't want any mis—dis—*mis*count that gits in such work. And, cum to think o' it, will vote no more of your bank men or their attorneys into office to "fix the value" onto money so it'll miscount like that.

The meat that Senators feed on makes them great. Once arrived at the seat of government they look back upon their constituency as through a telescope turned end for end. The people of the state of Maryland, which sent Mr. Gorman to the Senate, recently held a meeting in Baltimore to urge upon Congress the passage of a certain measure. When asked how he viewed the demonstration the Senator in a supercilious manner replied: "The people must hav something to amuse themselvs with, and this is just as good a way to do it as any other, I suppose. I sincerely hope they enjoyed themselvs." Kind, considerate father of his people! Let him keep them amused, or some day they may get serious and think it hardly worth while to pay the salary of Mr. Gorman. Then the joke would be on him.

This senator is a man of conspicuous piety. He has so much respect for the church that he believes its members may gamble without sin and without prejudice to the law that provides for the harassment of other gamblers. In fact, it is not to be doubted that he regards himself as a divinely appointed Senator from Maryland, the legislature that elected him being a mere ratifying convention, and the people not being in it at all. While no hereditary leader of his people, like Breckinridge, he sufficiently resembles him in the matter of piety to bear watching.

The lecture which Mr. S. P. Putnam delivers under the title of "Liberty and Authority" would not be a good one for a politician to star the country with. It contains too much Jeffersonian and Paine democracy to be popular in these days. It would not please the Democrats-and-Republicans, who want a strong and centralized government; and it is too radical to suit the Prohibition or Populite taste. In fact, Jefferson's notion that the country is governed best when governed least, and Paine's great truth that government is a necessary evil, contain no potential snaps for the politician, and hav been generally discarded. According to this lecture of Mr. Putnam's, Anarchism, even the philosophic sort, is impracticable on account of its incompleteness as a system, so long as we hav crime to deal with. State Socialism is to be rejected as a tyranny in itself, and as furnishing the majority with the best possible machinery for the suppression of new ideas. We cannot even compromise on Populism, whose every representativ in Congress voted to close the World's Fair on Sunday, whose Senators, like Kyle, of South Dakota, champion national Sunday laws, and which is the only political party (except the Prohibitionists) to incorporate the whim of divine sovereignty as a plank in its platform. On the whole, Putnam's "Liberty and Authority" contains good, safe doctrin, which must some day become the refuge of Freethinkers from the maternalism of present governmental theories.

I am reminded that the demand of Coxey's army for government work for the unemployed and large appropriations for the building of roads has a distinguished and time-honored precedent in the protectiv tariff and appropriations for the improvement of unnavigable waterways. I am grateful for the suggestion, and ready to admit that if the government owes the manufacturer a bounty on his product, it owes the workingman the same on his labor. It cannot, of course, be maintained that the employee is benefited by the protectiv tariff, because there is free trade in labor, but even if such a contention could be upheld, it would be much more just to pay men directly from the treasury than to continue subsidizing manufacturers and trusting them to dole out to their employees the dregs of public patronage. According to the new light, McKinley is the original Coxey, and his army is composed of protected manufacturers who march on to Washington in palace cars, either as legislators elect or as delegates from chambers of commerce and other organizations of public beneficiaries. Carrying out the analogy, we hav Coxey Frye in the Senate, and Coxey Morse in the House, demanding concessions to the church; and their industrial army of clericals, camped in the Washington hotels, had evacuated the capital but a few days before the true Commonweal army invested it. That the "tramp" leader. should hav been clubbed and imprisoned, instead of these others so much more in need of that treatment, does not speak highly for the Washington constabulary.

Under a system of compulsory vaccination, by doctors who hav a pecuniary interest in the operation, instances of serious illness and death as a result of the practice are of almost daily occurrence. Added to these evils is the almost equally great one of invasion of person and property, and the inoculation by main strength of people who deny both the efficacy of the treatment and the right of the state to enforce it. The whole business comes as clearly under the head of outrage as does any other kind of assault. If we had the statistics of vaccination and voluntary abortion, we should probably find the balance of ill-effects on the side of the former, and yet the state enforces the one and makes a crime of the other. I take it that the attitude of the law makers toward the latter is nothing more nor less than an accident. If previous to the passage of laws on the subject some public nuisance had introduced into the legislature a bill providing for the inspection by public officials of all unmarried members of the female sex falling under suspicion, and an enforced operation in case guilt was established, the legislature would hav enacted it into a law, and members of the health board, with Comstock as their spy, would be official abortionists instead of vaccinators. And there would certainly be as good grounds for such a law as can be adduced for the present action of the board of health; for all moralists must admit that an unmarried female may sustain an attack of variola with less serious results, social and moral, than those which attend unwedded motherhood. As dispensers of prophylactics, the vaccinators must stand second to the crowd of so-called malpractitioners now under indictment in this city, while, as perpetrators of outrage, purveyors of ill-health, and as accessories to homicide, the positions are reversed. The law under which they operate should carry a clause providing that all sections of the Constitution guaranteeing the security of person or property are hereby repealed.

I pray that Mr. E. O. Roscoe of Brooklyn will not take offense if I interpose no further argument against his position on the finance question. I conclude that he is wedded to the gold-basis idea, or the idea that all trade is barter, one commodity of which must of necessity be gold; between himself and that idea there is that perfect compatibility of temperament which always exists where one rules and the other implicitly trusts and obeys, and there are therefore no statutory grounds for his divorce. There are women, said to be intelligent, who protest against the enfranchisment of their sex; the other day I read of a convict who refused to leave his prison when his sentence expired; and when queer things like these occur I cannot reasonably be surprised at Mr. Roscoe's reticence. We hav a financial basis that is continually contracting, continually depressing prices, and more and more repelling investment and industrial enterprise. Possibly Mr. Roscoe is a capitalist who knows that under these conditions idle money reproduces itself. If he has securities redeemable in gold, he knows that their value will continue to increase with the increasing scarcity of gold and contraction of the currency. On this supposition his fealty to the gold standard is easily explained. If, however, he is a debtor, able and willing to carry out his contracts as they were made, but with diminishing ability to fulfil them with money every day becoming harder to get, he is as peculiar a freak as the prisoner I hav mentioned. I do not hold that the remonetization of silver alone would inaugurate a commercial millennium. With land monopolized, with taxes, interest, rent, and debt consuming the vitals of industry; with great hordes of official loafers on the payroll of town, county, state, and nation; with swarms of priests and preachers robbing poverty of its pennies; with the artificial impediment to commerce, known as the tariff, between the owner and the buyer; with a venal legislature dictating terms to trade and speculating on its vicissitudes which they themselvs can cause; with all the existing insecurities to life, liberty, and happiness, I do not suppose that one minor reform can act as a panacea; but I am firm in the conviction that the first nation to remonetize the white metal will be the first to grasp a hunk of returning prosperity.

GEO. E. MACDONALD.

Never too Young for Truth's Army.

NAPLES, N. Y., April 30, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I cannot invest very heavily, for I am a poor boy, but I am determined to know something of this good work of Freethought. Christians tell me I am too young to stand out so, but when they talk with me they generally show the "white feather" and think I am more than of age, but such is not the case.

Long may the work prosper. Find twenty-five cents for "Answers to Christian Questions." I take your valuable paper in partnership with another of my class.

Yours for victory,

YOUNGSTOWN, O., April 30, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me "The Christian Religion; What is to be its Final Outcome?" by an Old Farmer.

Am glad to hear that you hav shown what the American Protectiv Association really is. It is simply a Protestant organization, that is all. I am informed that many Liberals are members of this organization, but I hope they will leave as soon as they find out what it is. At Lowellville, a short distance from here, the Junior Mechanics and the American Protectiv Association hav been fighting against the efforts of some Liberals and Catholics to prevent the Bible being read in the public schools of that place. If Christians want to fight each other, let them do so.

With best wishes for the success of our grand and glorious cause, which is redeeming the world, I remain, Yours very truly, D. T. JONES.

GIBBON, NEB., April 29, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: The "queer little book" that you say you hav published for the au thor—"Euthansia"—does not get very favorable notice from you. I do not know anything of Mr. Hickey that would enable me to judge of the merits of the book, but I am one of those who think the "ethics of suicide" is a subject that does not deserve either the sneers or disapprobation of anyone. I believe that suicide should hav universal sanction, and should be held sacred as an available means of ending misery of body or mind. No sentiment either of morality or religion should ever pronounce censure against suicide, except solely such as takes into consideration the duty and obligations that a man owes to those living who are dependent upon him, and who claim from him the sacrifice of living against the solace of dying. I inclose fifty cents for the "queer little book," and I earnestly ask of you to change the tone of your notice. You may be as noncommittal or as neutral as you please, but don't tread harshly upon sacred things. Don't treat lightly those burdens of soul from which philosophers and statesmen hav found grateful release in death. The fault in our ethics upon this question is that what has been granted as a boon to philosophers has been wrongfully withheld from the suffering commons.

Yours respectfully, C. PUTNAM.

Seventy-six Years Old and Went Fifteen Miles.

JACKSONVILLE, ILL., May 5, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I had the pleasure of attending three lectures given by John R. Charlesworth at Franklin, Ill., the 23d, 24th, and 25th of April. Subjects: "The Philosophy of Freethought;" "Is There a Life Beyond the Grave?" "Is the Bible the Inspired Word of God?"

These addresses were grand, to say the least. I was well paid for going fifteen miles to listen to him. Mr. Charlesworth and myself spent a day with six brothers (Roberts) and their wives and mother, all Freethinkers, and you ought to hav seen the table and heard the music. Good for Apple Creek! We voted our speaker a champion. A little sky-pilot, Rev. Mr. Swindell, drew a Bible from under his arm, and said it was God's holy word, and it was a chain around our necks to bind us together. It gave consolation to father and mother, to all of the family. Charlesworth replied that it was a chain about our feet and brain to retard our progress; a chain that bound Bruno and Servetus to the stake to be burned; the same chain hung witches in New England; Galileo suffered from the same chain. The world does move all the same. If it givs conso lation to our friend to be taught that nine-tenths of the human family are predestined to be driven into a lake of fire and brimstone to be burned forever, he is welcome to enjoy his cruel propensities.

Yours truly, JONAS SCOTT.

Mortuary—Ludwig Magenheimer.

SAN JOSE, CAL., April 28, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: The inclosed clipping from the San Jose Evening Record of the 27th inst., truthfully says that a good man whose place it will be hard to fill has gone to his reward:

The deceased was born in Oggersheim, Bavaria, on August 23, 1820, which makes him 72 years of age. He married Miss Catharine Raab in 1845. In consequence of the religious revolution which racked his nativ country in 1849, he came to America with his young family, and remained in New York for five years. Leaving his young daughter there, he and his wife came to San Jose, and in 1856 they opened and conducted for seven years a restaurant and bakery business. Ill health caused Mr. Magenheimer to retire, and after recovering he looked after the business interests of the San Jose Turn Verein until last October, when his health compelled him to giv up altogether. He leaves a widow and a daughter, and two grandsons, Carl aud Ludwig Fisher.

Mr. Ludwig Magenheimer is well known to the Freethought world, being one of the only two subscribers to the Bruno Monument Fund within the corporate limits of this city, showing how diligently he watched for every Freethought movement on the globe. Always to the Liberal front, he will be sadly missed by the Freethinkers of this city. Liberal, just, and charitable to all, is the record of Mr. Magenheimer.

A Few Questions for E. O. Roscoe.

COOK, NEB., April 30, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Having been very much entertained in the reading of Mr. Roscoe's articles on finance, I wish him to answer the following questions, hoping thereby to get more light on the subject, so that I, at least, may be able to see what constitutes a money value.

1st. By what process do we know that there is one hundred cents' value in 25 8-10 grains of gold?

2d. If the twenty-five and eight-tenth grains of gold contain exactly one hundred cents' value, will that value ever change?

3d. If the value is liable to change, what certainty hav we that the value ever was or ever will be fixed correctly?

4th. If the law was repealed which makes of the 25 8-10 grains of gold a value of 100 cents, and a lawful money, would it still retain its present value and sell for 100 cents?

5th. Did the 412½ grains of silver of the silver dollar ever contain 100 cents value?

6th. Was not the rule just as reliable and just as correct that declared 100 cents' value in the 412½ grains of silver as that which put 100 cents' value in the 25 8-10 grains of gold?

7th. Had the rule been reversed, or should it be reversed to-day, and the 100 cents' value of gold be put at 412½ grains and that of silver at 25 8-10 grains, is there any valid evidence by which we can determin which is the nearest the truth?

8th. Does the price that any product or commodity brings on the market determin its value?

9th. Do acts of legislation ever hav any effect on prices of products or of value?

10th. What was it that caused 412½ grains of silver to bring 103 cents before the act of 1873, aud immediately after that act bring less?

11th. Was not its actual, real value just as great after the passage of that act as it was before?

12th. Is the rule the same that fixes the value on gold that fixes values on all other products of labor?

W. P. BROOKS.

The Ingersoll Home and College.

ST. JOSEPH, MO., April 30, E M. 294.

MR. EDITOR: On Sunday evening, April 29th, Mr. J. E. Remsburg delivered his great lecture on "Some Flaws in Christ's Credentials" at Turner Hall in this city, and he hand'ed his subject in his usual mast rly and logical manner. His subject had reference to the Christ of theology, and it was shown that Christ was a myth and therefore the Christian religiou was founded on a fictitious basis. Mr. Remsburg proved that there was just about as much reliability and inspiration in the writers of the gospels as there was in the writers of Munchausen's tales or Gulliver and no more. There was a very appreciativ audience of about two hundred.

We wish to express our thanks to the Turner S ciety for their magnificent hall, lighted and given free for the lecture; and we also wish to thank the gentlemen who furnished the fine music; and we will add, that we are very grateful to the Freethinkers who contributed money to pay the expense of the lecture. Our German friends came to the rescue nobly, and we hope to be able to hav more lectures.

Now, Mr. Macdonald, I wish to jog the Freethinkers a little on the subject of the Ingersoll college project. Your readers will remember that the question was mooted last year, and that I made a modest offer in THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 16th last to giv some land at Ingersoll Springs, and yet after I left the Congress there was a gentleman from Kearney, Neb., who offered more land and, as I understand, pledged himself to raise $20,000 to uild the home and college. I thought then, and still think, that mine was the best offer made on that occasion, because it was possible to make a success of it, and I hav been waiting to hear or see something about it in THE TRUTH SEEKER, but hav waited in vain. Now, my offer is open yet and the scheme can be made a success if we commence on a scale commensurate with Freethinkers' pocketbooks. At the Springs there would be no incubus of orthodoxy and it would be a Freethinkers' home and college in fact. I would like to hear something from some of the leading Freethinkers on the subject as soon as this great Coxey uprising is settled.

Hoping Freethought will prevail, I remain,

Yours fraternally,
G. G. BECK.

Items from Iowa.

CARROLL, IA., April 26, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just had a delightful visit at the charming home of Dr. G. A. F. de Lespinasse, vice-president of the Freethought Federation and the American Secular Union, at Orange City, Ia. The doctor is eq ally famous for his liberal largesse to the cause of radical progress and his literary ability to "bag hi game" when the other fellows fly too high. Here Lucy N. Colman spent a good many pleasant months and her portrait occupies the post of honor in this home. I hav known the doctor and his amiable wife for some years, visited and corresponded with them frequently, but never knew before that in his youth he had been a most proficient student of art in one of the leading schools of Holland. This time I was allowed an inspection of the treasures his portfolios coutain. I am simply astounded that a person possessing so much artistic skill could hav abandoned art entirely; if not for fortune, at least one would think he would hav pursued it for fame aud pleasure. The subjects were usually those of the severely classic order, with a scattering of rural sketches from nature. Free-haud sketches of the Venus de Milo, the gladiator, Mercury, etc., were specimens of real genius, while some larger study-heads were executed with extraordinary skill. It appears that the doctor's father and mother possessed artistic talents of high degree.

I enjoyed the musical treats this household affords. Mrs. de Lespinasse usually presides at the piano while the doctor skillfully plays the violin. Master Fred occasionally takes the piano while his mother brings forth the deep-sounding tones from the violincello. The doctor's sister, Mrs. de Crane, often assists. It is frequently claimed that "music hath charms to soothe the savage breast." While I hav not the skill to discover whether my breast has been tamed or not, on such occasions, I cannot refrain from "yelping," and, as the rest of them survived the ordeal, I presume that there will be no claims for damages.

This is by no means why I intrude on your readers. The doctor, his wife, and myself hav for years been Materialists of the ultra or Wettstein order. Latterly they hav been the recipients of a singular phenomenon that has puzzled them greatly. It is the usual table-tipping. Certain deceased relativs hav sent them messages. The doctor's father, mother, and others, are supposed to frequently manifest themselvs at these private seauces Usually Mrs. de Lespinasse and a Mr. Los, an intimate friend, are seated at the table; or Mrs. de Lespinasse and Henry de Lespinasse, the doctor's brother. Usually the deceased Mrs. Los is so persistent to communicate with her son that the sitters get tired and treat her with slight courtesy.

On the night of my arrival all the dead Chicago Anarchists made themselvs manifest, or were supposed to do so. First Parsons appeared and wished to speak to me. I asked if they were satisfied with what I had tried to do for them? The answer spelled out: "You are a true friend. Many thanks." He desired me to personally see his wife and sent her a written message with his "u dying love." Spies appeared aud held converse, so did Engel. Lastly, the very turbulent spirit of Lingg was supposed to be there. The table was so violent that I could not hold it still uuless the parties took their hands off entirely. Asked as to whether he would advocate the same ideas now, Lingg replied: "Hav struck for victory in a foolish way." Nearly all repudiated their ideas of force. On one thing Lingg was very emphatic, that he did not kill himself. Asked as to who had done it, he could not say. He suspected, but that was all. I asked their opinion of some present leaders of the labor movement and whether they approved of their course, but the replies were somewhat mixed.

Whether these manifestations are evidences of spirit life I am not prepared to say. But certainly it opens up a line of thought that I shall not be quite so certain on as of yore. I hav thought that possibly the table is moved by animal magnetism of the two or more sitters; that, by a process of telepathy or mind transference, the impressions of some one present is given those operators and the table or they spell out what is in their minds. This may or may not account for it satisfactorily. However, it is worthy of further investigation. Had this occurred among pronounced Spiritualists I should scarcely hav given it a second thought. Here were people that did not, nor do they yet, fully believe in Spiritualism, but they say they do not know. [Page of MS. missing.—ED.]

Mr. M —— prides himself on blooded stock and his stables contain some aristocratically pedigreed ponies, which he keeps for his "amusement," as he terms it. He piloted me to his barn, lit by incandescent electric lamps and affording by no means undesirable quarters. Here I found he kept lodgers—three specimens of the genus tramp—whom he pointed out to me with special pride. It is customary for town and deputy marshals to arrest all parties guilty of the unpardonable crime of poverty. In many cases these limbs of the law induce these tramps to commit an offense so they can secure a dollar or so for their arrest. To such exalted ideas of government Mr. M——— is not particularly favorable, and if a tramp wishes to secure a good place and plenty for his stomach he regales Mr. M ——— with harrowing tales of the cruelty of town marshals and, with his chronic detestation of government mixed with a good deal of the milk of human kindness, the hobo discovers that he has struck what he classically terms a "snap." However, this is a good thing for both, as it brings adversity in touch with prosperity. May many more practice it.

I ran down to Des Moines over Sunday and met Franklin Steiner, who had returned from his sea-board lecture trip the day previous. He has met with phenomenal success thus far, large audiences and considerable enthusiasm. In Meriden and Norwalk, Conn., the papers gave good notices—something they never had done before. At Greensburg, Pa., Mr. Steiner received flattering notices from the press—the first Freethought lecturer who has been so fortunate. The best test of a young lecturer's popularity is the increasing number of engagements. On his first lecture trip he had just six appointments, on his second, thirty. Steiner is coming to the front in splendid shape. Success to him! E. A. S.

PEORIA, ILL., April 2, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: It was my intention to write a short letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER the day following the evening of Colonel Ingersoll's lecture in this city in February, but other things interfered, so I was obliged to postpone my writing.

Colonel Ingersoll's visit to Peoria at that time was the first since 1878, if my memory serves me correctly. His subject was "Shakspere," and the place where he delivered his address was the Grand Opera House. Every seat and all available standing room was occupied, save in the galleries—vulgarly termed "coon heaven." The stage was supplied with chairs, and at least one hundred availed themselvs of the opportunity thus afforded to be near the speaker. Peoria being the colonel's old home, he needed no introduction, and when the lecture hour arrived he made his appearance wholly unattended, and without any prefatory remarks he entered at once upon his subject—after the audience allowed him to proceed. Never before has it been my pleasure to note such hearty good-will thrown into the applause which greeted a speaker. The applause which rolled upon the ear on this occasion was not of the sort one is so accustomed to hearing in a gathering of people that is to be addressed upon political issues. By no means; the applause given Colonel Ingersoll was of that character which impressed one as being the heartfelt appreciation of an exceptionally intelligent audience for an exceptionally intelligent and noted gentleman, in which all present participated. I will here add that the colonel's appearance upon the stage on this occasion marked the first opportunity I had ever had of seeing him. And when I saw him step out and take his position at the stand, I saw before me the man who of all men I hav heard slandered and shamefully abused; also, I saw before me the man who above all other men I was taught to shun, despise, and abhor. And not very many months since the effects of that damaging and ignoble teaching still clung to me with a tenacity made possible only by such instruction imbibed in childhood and youth.

While the subject upon which Colonel Ingersoll discoursed upon this occasion was not that upon which he is most noted, yet the opportunity to send an occasional shaft from his powerful and well-tempered bow into the ranks of the enemy was great, and he did it effectually; and little concern did he manifest as to the place at which those shafts would penetrate the old moss-covered shell of Christian orthodoxy. The enemy was all around him, and if the arrows he did send were hurled at random, they struck home, nevertheless, as was evidenced by the applause at the snap of his bow.

In the beginning of his address he said that we had gathered together to pay tribute to the world's greatest poet; that Shakspere was the greatest tragedian and dramatist the world ever produced. Though all this is true, said he, there was nothing miraculous in Shakspere's birth; he was born of natural parents, a natural father and a natural mother, both of whom had the happy and commendable habit of living in the world. He said that Christianity despised Shakspere with consummate hatred, his worst faults being that he would not go to church or damn souls; that Shakspere's father was an obscure man, about all we know of him being that he went to church once a month. He said that on the day of Shakspere's birth John Calvin died, and on that day nature wrought for mankind a greater boon and blessing than it had ever wrought before or has wrought since. He said that all men were happy when they were prosperous, when they had plenty of the world's goods; but that Christianity went hand in hand with famin, scourge, and pestilence, and was always prosperous when those conditions were prevalent.

Thus did the world's greatest living orator, and the church's greatest living enemy, deal out to Christianity, the most subtle, yet arrogant and destructiv enemy of the human race, that which it least wished to hear. I will say that it has been my good fortune to be in large gatherings and audiences, but never before has it been my pleasure to number one in such an audience as that which assembled to hear Colonel Ingersoll that winter evening, when intelligence is taken into consideration. You could look above, below, to the right and left, before and back of you, and none but intelligent men and women met your sight. Of course there were many Christians present, and as you see, I hav given them all credit for being intelligent. And unless they were so Christian hide-bound as to be totally unreceptiv of truth and beauty, I am sure that their standard of intelligence must hav been elevated a few notches higher than it was when they took their seats among us poor ungodly pieces of humanity.

Recently, in this city, in the Y. M. C. A. Auditorium, one of our prominent lawyers delivered an address upon Colonel Ingersoll's "Libel of Abraham Lincoln's Religious Beliefs." The ungodly of Peoria's citizens view the action of this lawyer as intended by him and the other promoters of the movement to forestall the effect that is likely to be produced when Colonel Ingersoll again speaks in Peoria the latter part of April or the first part of May next, at which time the Colonel's subject will be "Abraham Lincoln." Yet those whose ears and understanding are open to the truth, as regards the religious views and beliefs of Lincoln will not hav been so biased by what they may hav heard from the Peoria attorney as to refuse to listen to the arguments of the other side. I predict for Colonel Ingersoll a larger and as intelligent an audience on his next visit to Peoria as that which greeted him in February.

There is no Freethought organization in Peoria at present, but I think we will soon know the reason, if any, why one cannot be organized. We are amply strong to hav a good organization. All we need is some one to take the matter up and push it to an issue. If no one else moves in that direction soon, I shall place my own shoulder to the wheel first, and I hav sufficient confidence in others of like opinion to believe that there will be no lack of support.

While having your paper handed to me over the counter of the news-stand last Sunday, a copy was also handed to a young man standing at my side. I remarked to him that evidently we read the same Bible. He smiled, and replied that he was pleased to know it. He is a very intelligent young man, and I learned in subsequent conversation that he is yet a nominal member of Hale Chapel, a Methodist church in this city. He stated that he had not been in the church for fully six months, and had written the minister to call and see him on an important subject, which subject can be easily and readily surmised. He said he was forever through with churches, Christianity, and sky-pilots. So may it be GOWER.

The Prophet's Response.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., May 7, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Macdonald, in his last paper, still contends "that a paper dollar is redeemed (so far as the holder is concerned) when given for value received, and that it is finally redeemed when the government receives it for taxes;" to which it is only necessary to reply that if there is any difference in meaning between "redemption" and "transference," the latter expresses the sense of the transaction, and the former does not. The government certainly redeems the dollar when it accepts it in payment of its dues (which has never been contested), but it just as certainly renews its obligation every time it receives its notes; for instead of canceling, it reissues them, and thus they are never really redeemed for keeps. Mr. Macdonald "regrets that he was not informed earlier that Mr. Peck's responsibility, rather than that of the government, was questioned," to which I reply that at no time hav I questioned the responsibility of either Mr. Peck or Uncle Sam. My opponent continues by saying that "the reissue of notes by the government has no apparent disadvantages such as appertain to the sale of bonds for gold which the government cannot hope to repay without issuing other bonds; to which it may be remarked that, since the bonds bear interest, and are taken voluntarily, while the notes are a forced loan without interest, it would seem that the bonds were free from the charge of oppression, while the reissue of paper money reeks with it, unless one can get intrinsic worth in exchange—if he desire it—and this feature of redemption, I believe, my opponent considers unnecessary. But why can the bonds not be redeemed without issuing other bonds to raise the money? Hundreds of millions of bonds hav been redeemed, during the last few years, and that without issue of bonds of any description. What is the sinking fund for if it be not for the cancellation of bonds when they fall due (or are called in)? The last issue of fifty millions was not made to pay bonds. It was made for the purpose of strengthening the gold reserve which supports, at par, the treasury notes and the vast volume of silver and silver certificates with which those who believe as my opponent does loaded our currency, and which by its introduction created distrust in the public mind, and induced the financiers to sell their securities and get gold for paper from the treasury while it was yet to be had. Had it not been for our monkeying with the silver buzz-saw, the gold reserve could and would hav been maintained from the daily receipts at the custom houses. On account, however, of the distrust engendered by silver inflation, this became impossible, since the proportion of gold receipts sank from 95 to less than 5 percent of the whole within two years, and it is apparent that the interest, to which my friend objects, was caused by those who believe that the government can make fifty in silver equal in value to one hundred in gold that is to say, by my opponent's friends. In fact, our whole interest charge—past, present, and future—has arisen from the notion that the governmental stamp could create value, and from the fact that the authorities did not demand such an equal proportion of every man's wealth as would liquidate the war expenses as fast as they accrued, instead of issuing greenbacks and bonds, on which generations yet unborn must pay interest and finally redeem. The government did not hesitate to ask some for their lives; why, then, should it hav hesitated to ask the millionaire and the workman, and all intermediate classes, for, say, five per cent of their wealth? In concluding this topic, it seems logical to believe that the reissue of promissory notes by the government has all the "apparent disadvantages" that the continued renewal of his obligations would hav in the case of a private individual, without being so honorable, for the former transaction is a forced loan without interest, and the other would include a quid for a quo in the shape of the legal rate per cent.

"All the new matter in paragraph three is a prophecy of what would follow the free coinage of silver," says my opponent. That paragraph pointed out the fact that the free coinage of silver could only benefit owners of that metal—and others not at all—so long as the treasury retained the ability to pay gold for the silver dollars, and that, when the time came, as it shortly would, when the government was drained of its gold, it would hav nothing more valuable than one silver dollar to giv for another, which is no more prophecy than would be the assertion that my friend's note for $100 would be worth only the amount he was able to pay on it. If he could raise but fifty dollars his paper would lose just-one half of its face, and that is just what would happen to our paper and silver dollars under free coinage, since there is no more doubt that such currency would be presented for gold at the treasury than exists in regard to the willingness of even the free coiners to get two for one. I regret that Mr. Macdonald did not see his way clear to showing the fallacy—if he supposes it present—in the argument supporting this conclusion.

As to "the millions lost in unsuccessful mining ventures being regarded as a factor in the present cost of mining silver," it would seem as if the absurdity of such a proposition were sufficiently developed by simply calling attention to the fact that Mr. Macdonald, by reckoning this factor, makes silver cost $1.20 per ounce, while that quantity of silver is offered freely in the market for 64 cents, with mines enough still producing to supply any probable demand. My opponent still adheres to the notion that our money circulates largely in foreign countries, while being perfectly aware that foreign money does not circulate here, and in face of the fact that all exportations of money consist of gold, with a little silver, which are treated entirely by weight in any and all civilized countries.

My friend also opines that "the free coinage of gold fixes the price of that metal, and the suspension of silver coinage accounts for the fall in its price;" neither of which assertions is true. As to gold, it is certain that a gold dollar could never buy more gold than the coin contains, because there would be greater profit in having the gold coined than in selling it; and it is quite as certain that, if there were more gold in the coin than the dollar would buy, it would be melted by goldsmiths and platers, or exported to some place where it would bring its real intrinsic worth. The commercial price of gold fixes the purchasing power of the coin, therefore, and my friend has put the cart before the horse. As to silver, it is only necessary to call attention to the fact that silver had not been coined for decades before the so-called demonetization took place in 1873, for the reason that the white metal was undervalued by the ratio at which it was open to free coinage. Therefore, as undervaluation could not reduce the price of silver except by the infinitesimal difference that cessation of demand for coinage would produce, it is certain that, if overvalued, coinage could only set the commercial price of silver so long as the treasury possessed the power to pay the metal that was undervalued for the coined silver. Improvement in mining apparatus, the opening of more prolific mines, and the extension of railroads, hav cheapened silver, in the face of the fact that the government had for three years (before a short time ago) been buying about the entire American product. Silver, if I remember correctly, was about $1.10 per ounce when the Sherman Law passed, and fell to about 70 cents down to the time of its repeal, which, it seems to me, proves the fact that no sort of legislation can long keep the price of silver either above or below the commercial value.

In closing, let me assure my friend that he has lost sight of the fact that the four hundred and fifty millions the government—he says—received in taxes during a year bears a very small proportion to the commercial transactions of a single day in one city, in which view of the case it is certain that such a very picayune outlet could not possibly maintain a distrusted currency at par. The most it could do would be to arrest to a small extent its depreciation.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Seth Sander's Religion.

A PASTORAL.

Seth Sander kept a grocery store
At Squashburg, state of Maine,
Wherein the thousand things were sold
That country stores contain;
Molasses, codfish, cotton cloth,
Grindstones, lung balsam, shoes,
Ink, paper, mopsticks, sewing silk,
Mixed paints in reds and blues,
Hoe handles, bonnets, pocket knives,
Salt mackerel, hats and caps,
Umbrellas, hair dye, wooden pails,
Wheel grease, and ladies' wraps.
An absent-minded chap was he,
And sometimes goods got low,
Or ran completely out of stock
Ere he the fact did know.
Folks would ask for this and that
And Seth would say (or squeak),
"Jest about all aeout;
Hav some in next week."

So oft he had to use this phrase
It got to be a joke,
And everybody used to laugh
Whene'er these words he spoke,
But "Methody camp-meeting" came,
And to it people flocked
In numbers such that half the roads
With teams were fairly blocked.
The joke was quite forgot and all
The townfolk staid away
To sing and shout and cry "Amen!"
And one warm, sleepy day,
While Seth dozed idly in his store,
A solemn man passed through
The village and stepped stiffly in
And slowly said, "Hav you Religion got?" Seth, half awake,
Replied, with same old squeak,
"Jest about all aeout;

On Thursday I was less fatigued, and had several little talks with the children in the car. I took Lulie Hendricks, five months old, in bed with me in the morning, while her mamma was dressing. At Battle Mountain, where we stopped for breakfast, the Indians came to greet us, squaws gayly attired, with papooses strapped to their backs, and a flour bag over their faces for a veil, and tall braves arrayed in bright-hued blankets, moccasins, and slouching hats. One copper-colored grandmother walked behind her daughter, who, for a nickel, deigned to let us look upon her baby's face. They liv in villages near by, and belong, some to the Shoshone and others to the Piute tribe. They speak little English, but can say "money" distinctly. but they appear very fat and are lazy-looking for the most part.

So we rode along, losing the timber line, and passing through an arid region, all hills and dry sand. At Winnemucca I noticed by the sign that the distance to San Francisco is 475½ miles, and here were more Indians, the women good-natured, with red handkerchiefs on their heads, while the men were smoking. They had discarded blankets, and were displaying watch-chains and seals.

We came to a little town called Rye Patch, a lonely looking place, yet the children in the doorways and yards seem lively and happy.

We were now in Nevada, and not infrequently saw snakes coiled near the track. Since we left the beautiful Salt Lake valley we saw no trees, only sand and wild sage. After leaving Humboldt we came along past a large, broad stream called the Humboldt sink. It shows three different colors, green, blue, and pale oliv. At times it is not to be seen at all, entirely disappearing, so that one could walk from shore to shore. But, at this time, big waves are washing nearly to the railroad track. The alkali lands are here and there is no vegetation.

At Wadsworth more Indians met us at the station, their faces painted yellow and red, women arrayed in blue calico with white trimmings and scarlet sacks.

After leaving Wadsworth an incident in the cars stirred the heart of every one. A fine-looking young man was taken with a fit, epileptic, I think. He was awfully convulsed, and it was dreadful to see him, although he was unconscious. Mrs. Laura Hastings, a physician from Hastings, Neb., and others, rendered necessary assistance. Reno, and, in fact, nearly every town of importance, seemed familiar from correspondence of the Children's Corner. I walked through the emigrant car when we stopped at Reno, and saw the poor woman who was taken insane a day or two ago. It was necessary to confine her, she became so violent and had tried to jump from the car.

At Verdi we passed the boundary line and came out of Nevada into the state of California. The Truckee river winds along through a fine country, and into the stream falls many a mountain stream and silvery cascade. Again we were in a rich timber region, with snow on one side of the track and green grass upon the other. Toward dark, after leaving Truckee, we began ascending the Summit in the romantic Sierra Nevada mountains. The snow sheds, however, conceal much of the grandeur of the scenery. The darkness came all too soon, and obscured the view, which some did not regret, as the way is said to be as perilous and frightful as it is magnificent and grand. On Friday morning, April 6th, we arrived in San Francisco, and I was glad to find a resting-place at the Russ House, and it seemed to me I was never so wearied before. But I hav spanned the continent from the Atlantic to the Pacific shore, hav travelled four thousand miles from the frost and cold of New England to the land of fruit and flowers. The country traversed is beautiful and glorious. No other land that I hav seen compares with it, and it is ours. Best of all, over its vast domain the bells of Freedom ring.

California beamed upon my vision like a queen in robes of royal magnificence. It is a lovely land, with all kinds of zones, and ozone in abundance. Like Rome, San Francisco stands upon seven hills. Roses, lilies, and marguerites adorn the door yards and fill the air with fragrance. Blossoms are everywhere, and the green grass rivals that of the Emerald Isle, about which so much has been said and sung.

Correspondence.

HOOPESTON, ILL., March 4, 1894.

MX DEAREST AUNT SUSIE AND CORNER FRIENDS: As I havn't written to you since "last year," I thought I would write to-day, as a good opportunity presented itself.

This is a beautiful March Sunday afternoon, and I hav just finished a hearty dinner. I wish everyone in the world could hav as good a dinner and enjoy it as I did mine.

I went to church this morning to hear a new pastor. He is young, but married, and just as "soft" looking as he can be. He is a Rev. Mr. Smith from Manchester, Ia, and he preaches to-day and to-night as a candidate. One thing he said which struck me very forcibly was: "The reason there are so many Atheists is seeing innocence suffer. The people say that if there is a God, why dosn't he prevent suffering? Well," he said, "it isn't because he can't, but because in preventing suffering he takes away a man's freedom! And without his freedom man would be a mere puppet." He then gave an illustration: "Supposing you were going out some fine morning to take a walk, and, of course, you hav your freedom to walk if you wish. In another part of the country a man tumbles into a deep well. A hasty prayer is offered that the attraction of gravity may be checked and the man cease falling. Now, if God should answer that prayer, the man would cease falling, but you would also discontinue your peaceful walk. The attraction of the other planets would take you flying through space." Now, what do you think of that? I expect the congregation will keep him, for he seemed to suit pretty well.

One evening, not long ago, one of the "sisters" attempted to organize a young people's society; she came down with a long face, a pious expression, and a lecture "two yards long." She talked about funerals, battles, and such like, and my sister and another girl smiled just as she got to the funeral part, and she asked them to please leave if they could not keep from laughing, whereupon the girls (both lively) rose and marched out. She then continued her discourse until about time to close. They were all busy singing "Beulah Land" when one boy (her nephew) caused another boy to turn a double somersault. This settled the matter, and declaring that she had not the "nerve" to manage such a lot of young people—that it would take a man, and that she would ask one of the "brothers" to come down—she went home. The next week the man came and organized a nice society with thirty-eight members. I am on the program to take part in a debate. This is the subject: "Resolved, There is more happiness in the savage than in the civilized state." I hav the negativ, but I anticipate defeat.

I am invited to a big party next Wednesday evening out in the country about three and half miles I understand they are going to hav colored waiters. Isn't that "gusto"? I expect to hav a fine time, but "Oh, the foolishness o't."

This is a windy day, but I suppose we may expect many similar ones this month.

Our commencement exercises are still non est. The principal gave us permission to find out about the exercises; that is the reason I wrote to you about it.

You remember that I told you that the professor was deep in politics. Well, yesterday was the election, and, after all his work and neglect of the school, he was defeated. I am very sorry, for I expect he will be crosser than a bear.

School will close Friday, May 25th. I will be glad, for I hav been going to that school for ten years, and I think that it is most time enough to put in on an ordinary education.

Well, I will not take up any more of your valuable space. Mamma says, "Giv Aunt Susie my best love." We all send love and best wishes.

Yours for the prosperity and advancement of Liberalism, IDA L. JOHNSTON.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

Just Out.—25 Cents—Five Copies for $1.

A Liberal living in Michigan said once that he would give $25 a year to have the Crimes of Preachers recorded, as the frequent lapses of virtue of the ministers showed how little value Christianity possesses to make men moral.

We have just issued the Fourth Edition of the book doing this The additions for this new edition of the

"Crimes of Preachers"

shows nearly 400 cases of ministerial conduct. While those in previous editions show that within a few years about

of one kind or another of criminal conduct. Most of the crimes are against women, for the fair sex are at once the weakness and the strength of the church—"the church" meaning of course the clergy.

Notwithstanding the many additional pages, we have kept the price the same, 25 cents. Send for a copy, and confound the churchmen. Show them just what sort of scamps are the clergy who have closed the World's Fair on Sunday, because it is so holy a day that to look upon machinery or paintings in this period is "immoral."

REDUCTION IN PRICE OF A GREAT BOOK.

With the eighth edition of Winwood Reade's "Martyrdom of Man," the cost of production has been lessened so that we can reduce the price from $1 75 to $1.00.

The book has had a phenomenal sale for so heretical a work, second only to Helen Gardener's "Men, Women, and Gods," and we give our readers the pecuniary benefit of it. The is a very interestingly pictured synopsis of universal history, showing what the race has undergone—its martyrdom—in its rise to its present plane. It shows how War and Religion have been oppressive factors in man's struggle for Liberty, and the last chapter, of some 150 pages, describes his intellectual struggle from the animal period of the earth to the present, adding an outline of what the author conceives would be a religion of reason and love. The chapters are:

WAR. Egypt, Western Asia, the Persians, the Greeks, the Macedonians, Alexandria, the Phenicians, Carthage and Rome, Roman Africa, the Arabs.

RELIGION. The Natural History of Religion, the Israelites, the Jews, the Prophets Character of Jesus, the Christians, Arabia, Mecca, Character of Mohammed. Description of Africa, the Mohammedans in Central Africa.

LIBERTY. Ancient Europe, Invasion of the Germans, the Castle, the Town, the Church, Venice. Arab Spain, the Portuguese, Discoverers, the Slave Trade Abolition in Europe, Abolition in America, Materials of Human History

INTELLECT. Animal Period of the Earth, Origin of Man, and Early History Summary of Universal History, The Future of the Human Race, The Religion of Reason and Love.

RELIGION A CURSE, RELIGION A DISEASE, RELIGION A LIE.

By Samuel P. Putnam.

Dedicated to the American Congress, of 1892, which for the sake of Religion, Stabbed Liberty to the Heart.

A work burning with indignation inspired by the Congressional act closing the World's Fair on Sunday—an act which practically united the government and the Christian church.

To which is added Mr. Putnam's address delivered before the Columbian Exposition Committee of the House of Representatives against Sunday closing.

Also the following Essays and Poems by Mr. Putnam, which have never before been put in book form: Orthodoxy; Freethought; Man, Not God (written for a Paine anniversary); The Statue of Liberty and Thomas Paine; a poem written for the opening exercises of the Silverton, Ore., Freethought Hall; Death and Life; The Golden Age; Shut the Door (a poem on the closing of the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia, in 1876).

The main essay in this work is one of the strongest arraignments ever made of the religion which cramps and fetters the minds of the people of this country It should be distributed widely. It has been commended in the highest terms as it appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER and we hope every reader will buy a copy to lend his neighbor and arouse thought.

MAN IN THE PAST, PRESENT, AND FUTURE: A Popular Account of the Results of Recent Scientific Research Regarding the Origin, Position, and Prospects of Mankind. From the German of Dr. Ludwig Büchner, author of "Force and Matter," "Essays on Nature and Science," and other works. New York: Peter Eckler. Cloth. Price, $1.

This profoundly scientific and philosophical work appeared first in English translation about twenty years ago. To the present edition hav been added some cuts illustrativ of the text, and notes, etc. We read it first many years since, and at that time thought it one of the best books that had ever fallen in our way. We are not yet prepared to amend that verdict.

Professor Büchner inquires concerning the origin and antiquity of the human race, and defines the position of man in nature. The arrangement of the work is unusually felicitous, as will be seen by perusal of this paragraph of the preface:

"In order to avoid confusion by the particularly copious abundance of materials at hand, the author has arranged the actual, or more exact, proof of what is given in the text (consisting of quotations. scientific details, and further particulars or remarks), in a separate appendix, brought into connection with the text by continuous numbers, and also in a series of foot notes. He hopes that this method will augment the scientific value of the book without injuring its usefulness with the general public, to whose wants he has paid particular attention in the text itself."

"Whence do we come? What are we? And whither are we going?" are the problems, says our author, "which hav in all times occupied the human mind." Following the introduction, this book is divided into three parts, and each is set apart for the answering of one of these questions.

In the first part—"The Antiquity and Original State of the Human Race, and Its Development from a Barbarous Beginning"—the evidence in support of the contemporaneity of man with the now extinct animals of the Diluvial period are examined and summarized. The human remains and traces of human handiwork discovered in the cavern of Aurignac, in France, are minutely described. The reader is also told of similar discoveries in caves in Belgium, France, Italy, Spain, Germany, America, Asia, and Australia. The twenty years' struggle of Boucher de Perthes to overcome the scientific prejudices of his time is interestingly narrated, and it is shown how his discovery of antidiluvian rough flint axes in the valley of the Somme "gave a totally different aspect to the whole question of the antiquity of the human race upon the earth." These unpolished flint axes seem to mark the beginning of human invention and art. Dr. Büchner remarks:

"We may therefore regard the flint axes of the valley of the Somme, commonly known to archeologists from the special localities where they are found, as stone implements of the Amiens, or of the Abbeville type, as the earliest known trace of human industry, or as indicating the first and rudest beginning of the arts of civilization. As representing such a commencement as this, these objects, notwithstanding their simplicity and roughness, possess the highest significance, and must excite our deepest interest. For they show us with what rude and primitiv steps man must hav commenced his long and weary march toward civilization, and how poor and insignificant were the first beginnings of a culture which has since yielded such grand and noble results. They furnish us with the best guide to the recognition of the great fundamental law of nature and of man, according to which everything great and admirable that man or the universe can yield or possess, is not a gratuitous gift from above, but only attained by slow and laborious development from simple and rude beginnings, by gradual evolution of the powers and faculties slumbering in nature and in man. . . . To use the words of the celebrated discoverer of the flint axes, Boucher de Perthes, in his well-known memoir, 'De l'Homme antediluvien (Paris, 1860): 'Let us not then disdain these first essays of our forefathers; if they had not made them, if they had not persevered in their efforts, we should hav neither our towns nor palaces, nor any of those masterpieces which we admire in them. The first man who struck one pebble against another to giv it a more regular form, gave the first blow of the chisel which produced the Minerva and all the marbles of the Parthenon.'"

Another strong evidence for the contemporaneity of man and the Diluvial animals is found in the traces of the action of man upon the bones of extinct animals. Sometimes the bones were injured by wounds, "sometimes worked upon, and sometimes broken or split." Upon some are crude artistic markings representing various animals of that period and even man himself.

Not only in the Diluvial but in the still older Tertiary strata hav indications of the presence of man been found. But aside from all this we hav in the alluvium formations of the present epoch ample proof that man has existed on the earth for a length of time which can be measured only by tens of thousands of years, at the most moderate calculation. In this connection mention is made of the mounds in the valleys of the Ohio and Mississippi in North America, the borings in the delta of the Nile, human skeletons found in coral rock banks in Florida, excavations near Lake Geneva, the Lake-Dwellings of Switzerland and Italy, the Danish kitchen-middens and the same kind of refuse heaps on the coasts of the two Americas.

Geology knows no absolute numbers, "only such as are relativ or proportional." Of the length of time man has been an inhabitant of this globe we can form only an approximate estimate. No matter how long he has been here it is only for a moment compared to the age of the earth itself. Says Dr. Büchner:

"Thus we see that, great as may be the antiquity of man in comparison with the periods of history or tradition, he is nevertheless very young upon the earth itself, and under any circumstances, is one of its last and most recent productions. For even supposing that man was in existence as early as the close or even the middle of the Tertiary period, he still reaches but a little way up in the great scale of the history of the earth. This scale, so far as it relates to the fossiliferous strata, has been divided by Lyell into thirty-six members, but this number now appears to be too small, as still older strata hav been found to contain organic remains. In this scale, then, the man in the Tertiary period would extend to No. 3 or No. 4, or at the outside to No. 5 or No. 6! Innumerable races of plants and animals preceded him in series long drawn out, and during almost infinit periods of time, and man himself plays, as it were, only in the last act of a colossal drama, the first scenes of which are concealed from us by impenetrable darkness."

The historical period is said by Sir Charles Lyell to be only a creation of yesterday as compared with the eons "during which our race has actually inhabited the earth." For an unmeasured and unascertainable length of time, man, armed only with wedge-shaped fragments of stones, fought for existence against the savage and powerful scarcely lower animals of the Diluvial or Tertiary age. In nearly all instances primitiv man was small, "with a narrow skull and prognathous [oblique] jaws, and consequently low mentality, but that mental development, small as it was, was what preserved him in that almost interminable struggle for existence in which his weapons were so few and so poor. We say "almost interminable" advisedly, for as our author points out, man's progress was very slow, so slow that perhaps for tens of thousands of years he scarcely moved. Says Dr. Büchner, referring to the successiv ages of stone, bronze, and iron:

"A circumstance of great significance in the history of human development, observed in this transition from stone to bronze and from bronze to iron, is that the first bronze weapons were made exactly after the pattern of the old stone implements, and in the same way also the earliest implements of iron after the pattern of the bronze implements which preceded them, although without such models before them no one would hav thought of bringing the malleable and ductil metal into the rough and inconvenient forms of the stone age. From this instance we see most distinctly that the human mind cannot produce anything at once and directly from itself, but that it is everywhere confined to the laws of its gradual, sensualistic development, and to the nourishment furnished to it by impressions from without."

We must now pass from this part of the professor's fascinating work, although the temptation to linger there and reproduce much more than we hav room for is very strong.

The Second Part—"What Are We? The present position of man in nature; his developmental history and production from the egg cell; origin and genealogy of the human race"—tells of the place "our race occupies in the zoölogical system and with regard to the animal world which is so nearly related to it, but especially with regard to the highest representativs of the Quadrumana, and at the same time of the vertebrate type in general, which comes nearest to man in form and structure." There is found in this part an admirable summary of the evidence and arguments for the evolutionary hypothesis of man's origin as that evidence and those arguments were collected and formulated twenty years ago. Of course a still stronger case could be made out to-day, although at that time it was sufficiently formidable to convince all but the most prejudiced among educated people. We would suggest the careful perusal of this part of "Man, in the Past, Present, and Future" to the very small number of Freethinkers who do not accept the principles so ably elucidated and unanswerably demonstrated by Darwin, Huxley, Haeckel, and their fellow-scientists.

Part Three—"Where Are We Going? The future of man and the human race"—treats of the possibility of the existence of new and still higher races of men, and of the gradual elevation of the standard of culture and happiness over the whole world; of government, nationalities, society, capital, labor and laborers, the family, education, woman, marriage, morals, religion, philosophy, and Materialism and Idealism.

This is a very instructiv and it is also a phenomenally cheap book. It costs but $1 and is printed on heavy paper of an excellent quality, with long and broad pages and substantial cloth binding. There are 274 pages in the body of the work and 65 pages of appendix in small but clear type. The table of contents is unusually full and there is also a good index. In every way "Man, in the Past, Present, and Future" is a credit to the author and the publisher, as both are highly creditable specimens of the Man of the Present.

Pleasure and Progress.

III—Condition of Agriculture. Chap. IV. Public Schools, the Mene, Mene, Tekel of Socialism Chap. V.—Province of Government. Chap. VI.—Our Social Disorder.

Here are some of the verdicts on this remarkable production which have been rendered by men who are in every way qualified as judges of books:

This is a spirited, rattling sort of a book that skates right along over the deepest subject without much thought whether the ice is thin or not. It answers the greatest question—What is the use, object, motive, purpose, and summum bonum of life, and the real cause and motive of progress? —by one word, Pleasure!—Thaddeus B. Wakeman.

He sharply attacks, also, modern methods of education, and in this he is most abundantly borne out by the facts, and his arraignment is practically unanswerable. His book is altogether a curious and suggestive one.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

The man who wrote this book knows how to write a book, and knows what he is writing about. There is not a padded sentence in the volume, not an attempt to fill up with words for lack of knowledge. The author deals hard blows at shams and falsehoods, and hard blows for realities and truth. We do not see how anyone can read this book and disagree with the leading propositions. The work is good; every chapter is worth reading. It is a work of common-sense Socialism. The chapter on public schools ought to be put into a tract and sent to every teacher in the land. Thousands of sentences are worthy of being framed as political maxims and hung up all over the nation. the book deserves a wide reading, not only for its literary style, which is clear and incisive, but for is bold, honest sayings.—L. K. Washburn.

After you read this book you will be as enthusiastic in praise of it as are the eloquent editor of the Investigator and the gallant President of the Canadian Secular Union,

Gems of Thought.

Do NOT bother over little things, but be sure to see to them.—Galveston News.

KEEP your word with your child the same as you would with your banker.—Ingersoll.

MANY a man is a Christian simply because he has been taught Christianity.—Investigator.

THE Christian God is a father who makes a great deal of his apples and very little of his children.—Diderot.

THERE is no wealth but life. That country is the richest which nourishes the greatest number of noble and happy human beings, that man is richest who, having perfected the functions of his own life to the utmost, has also the widest helpful influence, both personal and by means of his possessions, over the lives of others.—Ruskin.

OUR lives are universally shortened by our ignorance. In attaining complete knowledge of our own natures and of the natures of surrounding things—in ascertaining the conditions of existence to which we must conform, and in discovering the means of conforming to them under all variations of seasons and circumstances—we hav abundant scope for intellectual progress.—Herbert Spencer.

MAN did not exclaim, "How holy!" when he first fell upon his knees. His feeling was rather, "How terrible!" The sense of holiness is a social product—a high sublimation of morality. Man had to possess it himself, and see it highly exemplified in picked specimens of his kind, before he bestowed it upon his gods. Deities do not anticipate, they follow, the course of human evolution.—G. W. Foote.

NO ONE man is nobler born than another, unless he is born with a better capacity and a more amiable disposition; those who make such a parade with their family pictures and their pedigrees may, properly speaking, be called notorious rather than noble persons. I think it right to say thus much, in order to repel the insolence of some folk who owe their distinction entirely to accidental circumstances, and not at all to their own merits.—Seneca.

BLESSED is he among men who, from his ancestry, has inherited pure blood rather than red gold, who has the competence necessary to health and content, who, in a cottage amid the hills, can liv far away from the city smoke, to whom all nature is worship, every sun-rise an altar and the fire thereupon, every zephyr an idyll, every sea-moan an elegy, and every gust of air from the fields of bean and clover the breath of an incense holier than aisle or chancel ever knew—Saladin.

THE Secularist position is clear and distinct, and amid the warring of the sects it must gradually come to the front. The state should hav nothing to do with the teaching of religion. The common school should be the common ground where the children of all faiths and of no faith should meet on a footing of perfect equality, and be taught only the indisputable truths of secular life. From the waste of their valuable time in learning old superstitions and barbarous dogmas, which must be painfully unlearned, let us endeavor to save the children.—J. M. Wheeler.

THE nation prospered—grew in knowledge and wisdom. Poverty diminished; political honor triumphed over political chicanery; peace reigned; the people were happy. "Whose work is this?" said the stranger from a foreign land. "It is ours," said Culture and Enlightenment. "It is mine," said Charity. "Look at the hospitals, almshouses, and houses of refuge I hav built." The stranger looked in the direction indicated, but observed that most of these were deserted, or were in ruins, as if no longer needed for the uses to which they had once been put. "It is my work," said the Church; but the stranger's memory served him still, and he turned away. "It is mine," said Industrial Progress. "It is mine," said both Political Parties. "It is ours," said the Upper and Lower House. The stranger questioned, still unsatisfied. He noted that back of these answers rang a persistent "mine, mine, mine," with endless iteration and contradiction. Behind the figures called up by his inquiry loomed larger and fuller than any of these, a more benignant shape, which he recognized as the one from whose lips came the persistent "mine, mine, mine" of the refrain which swelled over the claims of those who had spoken. "Those to whom you listen are but my instruments, or follow in my wake," said the figure. "What you see is all my work, for my name is Freedom."—Joseph Dana Miller, in Kate Field's Washington.

STRONG, HEALTHY MANHOOD

Those Afflicted with Early Decay, Loss of Manhood, Wasting Discharges, Varicocele, Mental and Physical Debility and who are desirous of being cured, a booklet will be sent to their address for ten cents, sealed in a plain envelope giving causes and symptoms of the complaints, and a description of the Doctor's important medical discovery—an Outward Application—a positive cure—the only remedy of the kind in existence—with evidences of success. Address,

DR. R. P. FELLOWS,

Say where you saw this advertisement. Vineland, N. J.

I wish to say that I am an out-and-out LIBERAL, and I trust the Freethinkers of the land will give me their patronage and not waste the time and money on Christian doctors.—Dr. Fellows

Not for Parsons.

PARSON: "Now, what are the peculiar distinctions of Quakers? For instance, how do they speak differently from you and me?" Pupil: "Please, sir, they don't swear."

"THEY are going to try Dr. Griggs for heresy." "You don't mean it! On what grounds?" "His interpretation of the Eden episode. He insists that Adam and Eve ate a banana, and that their fall was due to their carelessness with the peeling."

"Now, little boys, what is the meaning of the word hypocrisy?" asked a Sunday-school teacher of her favorit pupil. "I can't explain what it is, but I know just the same." "Giv me an example of hypocrisy." "When a fellow says he loves his Sunday-school teacher—that's hypocrisy."

THERE is a very religious restaurant in Boston, on the walls of which there is an odd jumble of texts of Scripture and items from the bill-of-fare, sometimes as follows: "He shall feed his flock like a shepherd—Hot sausages, 10 cents." "If ye be obedient ye shall eat of the fat of the land—Hot apple sauce, 5 cents." "God moves in a mysterious way—Hash, 10 cents." "Be careful for nothing—Coffee and cakes, 10 cents."

WE observe that some ministers hav been praying for rain. Without meaning to discourage the prayer habit, we would suggest to the brethren that they are likely to accomplish more permanent good by advising their neighbors to construct irrigation systems. Prayers may bring rain, but irrigating ditches will render the prayers unnecessary. Let them cultivate piety, but they should not fail to irrigate.—Oakland Times.

THE beadle was in by-gone days always a prime hand at throwing in a little bit of sarcasm at the expense of some young sprigs of the ministry. A young minister with rather an exalted opinion of his own powers said to the beadle, "I don't think I need put on the gown, John. It's only an encumbrance, though some folk seem to think it makes a preacher more impressiv." To this John, who had a less exalted opinion of the preacher's power, quietly replied, "Ay, sir—that's just it, sir. Pit it on for ony sake. It makes ye mair impressiv; and ye need it a', ye need it a'!"—London Freethinker.

SHE was the old reprobate of the village, and our new curate wanted to get her to church. So he sent her a beautiful shawl by the mission ladies, and the next Sunday she appeared at church, according to promis. After the service, the curate tackled her: "Glad to see you at church, Mrs. Muggins." "Ah, bless your riverence, and 'twas a rale beautiful sermon you gave us, to be sure. And when did all o' them dreffal things 'appen, sir, 'as you told us o' poor Jesus?" "It is eighteen hundred years, Mrs. Muggins, since Jesus Christ was so cruelly slain for our sakes." "Lawks-a-mercy, sir, as it was all so long ago, let us 'ope as it aint true!"

A BOY of twelve years, going to confession lately, revealed to his father confessor that he had been guilty of turning "flipflops" on the previous Sunday. The father, desirous to award a suitable penance, but ignorant of the exact character of the offense, inquired, "What are these flipflops, my son?" "I'll show you, father," said the boy. And he jumped up from his knees and turned a couple of handsprings before the confessional box, to the utter astonishment but the secret amusement of the priest. The next penitent in turn, who had anxiously witnessed this strange performance, was a stout, red-faced, middle aged woman, who knelt with evident trepidation, and stammered out, "Och, father, dear, don't be giving me such a Lenten pinnance as that, for the dear Lord's sake!"—Cambridge Chronicle.

MINISTER: "And you feel an awakening within you, my friend?' Penitent printer: "I do sir. I feel that I hav been a great sinner, a very great sinner. I'm afraid there's no salvation for me." M.: "Come, come, my friend, do not be despondent. You know the lines, being a printer, about the vilest sinner returning. I think you are in a hopeful condition—a very hopeful condition." P. P.: "Ah! but I've been such a Sabbath breaker." M.: "Working on a Sunday paper, I presume." P. P.: "Oh, no. The men who work on Sunday papers don't break the Sabbath. Their work is done on Saturday night. I work on a daily paper, and the Monday morning issue is all set up on Sundays. But I'm determined to leave the business; I'll break the Sabbath no more by setting type." M.: "I rejoice to find you in such a frame of mind. You will be a bright and shining light in the church one of these days. And you hav had to set type on Sundays, my poor friend—reports of dog-fights, pugilistic mills, and so forth, I suppose?" P. P. (weeping bitterly): "No, sir, principally reports of ministers' sermons, in solid onpareil."—Investigator.

YAHWEH WANTS TO CONVINCE THE DEAD THAT HE IS GOD.

"SPECIAL PAINE MEMORIAL, ILLUSTRATED"

Issue June 2d, Ready May 30th.

Price, per copy, 7 cents; five or more, 5 cents each.

Every one of our readers should send for one to ten or more extra copies.

Agents and subscribers and Liberal societies are specially urged to give this number of THE TRUTH SEEKER the widest circulation. It will be historical. It will be interesting from first to last page. It is intended as a modest tribute to one of the men who were equal to America's need in the "times that tried men's souls." America is not longer justified in the policy of silence as to Thomas Paine's grand-hearted work in the cause of American Independence and humanity. And Americans should know of him that they may for themselves judge if he does not deserve a generous, candid "well-done" in the pages of American history. Justice may come slowly but come it will, when views are so broadened as not to take the traditional say-so of the misinformed or malicious, as truth. We therefore would ask the cordial interest of every reader, that he will do his little or much—we want all to assist in placing the immortal name of Thomas Paine where it rightfully belongs, and you can help in the way we indicate, and we hope you will.

Below find order-blank. If you prefer it and will give list of names covering copies you order, we will attend to prompt mailing. THE TRUTH SEEKER CO., 28 Lafayette Pl., New York.

Col. R. G. Ingersoll's ARGUMENT

IN THE

Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,

At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

How To Preserve Health.

By LOUIS BARKAN, M.D.

Fordyce Barker, M.D., Professor Bellevue Medical College says of it, writing to the author: "I regard your book as the most sound, sensible, and useful book on the topics which it discusses that I hav met with. I wish it could be in the hands of every intelligent head of a family. I am particularly pleased with one feature of it that it does not profess to teach dosing and drugging. I congratulate you on the wisdom and success of this effort."

Other noted physicians recommend it just as highly.

News of the Week.

AKRON, O., was under martial law last week.

NORWAY, Maine, was nearly all destroyed by fire on May 9.

ROBERT F. BRATTAN, Representativ from Maryland, died on May 10.

RICHARD CROKER has resigned the chieftainship of Tammany Hall.

ERNEST SLINGENEYER, Belgian historical painter, died in Paris last week.

TEN strikers were shot dead at the Thresia mine in Ostrau, Moravia, May 9.

VERY severe storms at Stillwater, Minn. Damage to extent of $20,000 in eight minutes.

HOT debate in the New Jersey Senate over a bill affecting the American Protectiv Association.

IT is counterfeiting to make a picture of your World's Fair medal. This renders the medal almost wholly worthless.

THE United States Supreme Court refuses to issue a writ of habeas corpus for the release of John Y. McKane, the Gravesend boss.

THE New York Park Board has concluded to obey the people and the law and construct two sidewalks on the Harlem River Speedway.

JULES LEMONNYER, known for his sumptuous reprints of works illustrated by the vignettists of the eighteenth century in France, has just died.

VIOLENCE in the Pennsylvania coke regions. Workmen willing to labor beaten nearly to death. Troops are under arms in the Alabama coal districts.

GENERAL MATTHEW M. TRUMBULL, one of the best equipped literary men of the West, and a stanch Liberal, died in Chicago last week, aged sixty-eight.

TALMAGE'S Tabernacle was burned Sunday, May 13. This is the third time he has lost his great church. The new Hotel Regent was also destroyed. Total loss, $1,500,000.

THE United States Senate is probably more cordially detested by the people, irrespectiv of party, than any other department of government. It grows more inefficient each day.

NINE editors of Berlin hav been sentenced to pay fines or suffer imprisonment for commenting unfavorably on the conduct of the police at the Fredrichshain Brewery on Jan. 18.

ROSEBERY'S budget bill escaped defeat on second reading in the Commons by the narrow majority of fourteen. The government has triumphed in the by-elections, but generally by reduced majorities.

The Compulsory Vaccination bill in the Massachusetts legislature was amended so that childen presenting a certificate from a regular physician that they are unfit subjects for vaccination are not subject to the law.

THE House of Magnates of Hungary, corresponding to our Senate, has rejected, by a majority of twenty-one, the civil marriage bill, which was presented by the ministry and passed by a heavy majority in the lower house. Probably the ministry will resign.

IN Hugh Price Hughes' Methodist Times, on the first page, appears an article by George Jacob Holyoake on Kossuth, who is said to hav been "inspired by religion and patriotism." The only extract from his American speeches is a favorable one about "reverend ministers" and "the Word of God."

THE Czar's government is making wholesale arrests of members of a new society called "The Friends of Political Liberty." The arrested persons include many people of eminence, including the director of the Statistical Bureau, a member of the Finance ministry, several government officials at Orel, bankers, engineers, students, fashionable dressmakers, and others. In searching the prisoners some of the women were compelled by the police to strip naked.

THE various "Commonweal armies" are still marching, floating, and traveling by rail. Kelly's "army" went down the Des Moines in flat-boats; several trains hav been seized in the new northwest, and recaptured by United States marshals. Some lives hav been lost. Coxey had a hearing before the House Committee on Labor, and his contingent has left its unhealthful camping ground in Washington and pitched its tents at Bladensburg, Md. In Pennsylvania some members of Galvin's detachment hav been sent to jail for trespass.

CONWAY'S EDITION

OF

THE WRITINGS OF THOMAS PAINE.

COLLECTED, EDITED, AND CHRONOLOGICALLY ARRANGED

By MONCURE DANIEL CONWAY.

Author of "The Life of Thomas Paine," "Omitted Chapters of History Disclosed in the Life and Papers of Edmund Randolph," etc.

Four Volumes, Royal Octavo, Gilt Tops, Uniform with the Editor's "Life of Paine." Price per Volume, $2.50.

An edition of one hundred and fifty numbered copies bound in half leather, gilt tops, uniform with the limited editions of "The Writings of Washington," "The Writings of Jefferson," etc. Price, per volume, $4.

For the general reader the $8 edition of Paine's works is sufficient, as it contains all of his writings upon which his fame substantially rests. But for those who desire to go deeper into the subject of the man and polemic we can most unreservedly commend the "Life of Paine" by Mr. Conway, and this edition of Paine's works edited by him It is the fullest that we are likely to have, and the student of history, and particularly the writer, should have it upon his shelves.

The work will consist of four volumes, and will be arranged chronologically. The cause of America, as Paine said, made him an author, and the first volume will cover the period of the American Revolution, beginning with the year 1774. It will therefore open with Paine's anti-slavery essay, and his philosophical or moral essays, while editing the Pennsylvania Magazine; these being followed by the great revolutionary, political, and controversial pamphlets which made such a profound impression on the country.

The second volume will consist mainly of the "Rights of Man," and pamphlets relating to English politics, but will also contain certain papers on French affairs.

The third and fourth volumes will consist mainly of Paine's religious writings, but will also contain some essays relating to American affairs, written in his last years. At the close will be given Paine's poems.

The first volume is now ready for delivery, and the others will follow soon. Orders for the whole set will be taken and filled as the volumes appear, or the volumes can be purchased separately. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER CO., 28 Lafayette Place, New York.

The object of this work is to present the Course of Freethought throughout the Civilized World for the last Four Centuries, from the time of Columbus and Bruno to the time of Ingersoll.

It will be a radical Historic Record of the Greatest Developments of the Human Race.

It will reveal Freethought as an Intellectual, Moral, Literary, Social, Industrial, and Political Movement.

Is Presbyterianism Falling by the Way?

Dr. Briggs continues to be a rock of offense in the Presbyterian church. One of his aggressiv partisans is Dr. Henry M. Field—of the famous Field brothers—editor of the New York Evangelist. His most bitter and untiring opponent is Dr. George L. Shearer, senior secretary of the American Tract Society. In a letter which he has lately sent to the press, Dr. Field says:

"The only trouble is that Secretary Shearer will not keep to his 'official work.' If he would only mind his own business, and leave 'ecclesiastical politics' to take care of themselvs, we should soon hav quietness and peace. But he is so possessed with the idea that he is called of God to regulate all the affairs of the church that he has ended by becoming a general meddler and mischief maker, and incurred an odium which reacts to the incalculable injury of the society. If he were a private individual, and had an irrepressible desire to go into a 'scrimmage,' there would be nothing to restrain him; but he is the head of a society that represents us all, so that the whole church has to bear the reproach of his indiscretion. If he is so obtuse as not to see the impropriety of such a departure from his proper 'official work,' let him put somebody else in his place. Can he imagin the late Dr. Kendall figuring as 'king of the caucus,' making his office a place of rendezvous for the leaders of a party where they should meet to count noses, fix up tickets, and lay plans for carrying elections? But would this hav been any worse in a secretary of the Home Missionary Board than it is in a secretary of the Tract Society?

"What is the result? Many old supporters of the Tract Society are repelled from it by a feeling of disgust. The best friend it ever had was the late William E. Dodge, who gave to it as long as he lived, and in his will left it a legacy of $30,000. Why is it that his son, who bears that honored name and inherits his father's benevolence, will not giv this society a dollar? Nor D. Willis James, though he has more than once given to a single object a hundred thousand dollars? Nor Mr. Morris Jesup, who is one of the most generous men in our city, giving freely to every good cause? Why does he draw the line at the Tract Society? Why will John Sloane, an elder in Dr. Hall's church, not giv a penny? Nor John Crosby Brown, who would naturally be held to the Tract Society by a double tie, that of his father, the late James Brown, and of his father-in-law, the late Dr. William Adams, who was one of the main pillars of that society for thirty or forty years? If the society has now grown so great that it can afford to drive away such men, then surely it does not need to ask for further contributions from the Christian public."

Well, well, but this is a beautiful state of affairs. Here is the American Tract Society, which for nearly seventy years has been flooding the country with the most orthodox publications, compelled to report a falling off in its revenues. What is the cause? Has the Society been sending out literature tainted with heresy? By no means. Its tracts now as always before enunciate the unyielding Calvinistic doctrins. It has not surrendered to the "Higher Criticism." It still preaches eternal hell and maintains the dogma of the inerrancy of the Bible. What, then, is the trouble? It is just this: Its chief secretary stands by the old creed and hates the new-fangled notions of Dr. Briggs. He has not hesitated to say so, and he has done all he could to get Briggs out of the Presbyterian church. Now comes Dr. Field and tells all the world that this is just what is playing havoc with the finances of the Tract Society. He says that wealthy Eastern Presbyterians will not giv money to the Society if its officials activly interest themselvs against the heresies of Dr. Briggs. In other words, if the Tract Society antagonizes the infidelity of Dr. Briggs that gentleman's Christian friends will boycott the Tract Society. And it is the distinguished editor of an influential Presbyterian journal who tells this tale out of school! Things hav come to a pretty pass when a propagandistic religious society finds itself face to face with the alternativ of surrender of time-honored Christian tenets or the drying-up of the monetary steam which turns the wheel of its gospel-mill. Although Dr. Briggs is a heretic he is not a very robust one, but it begins to look as though he would prove to be a tolerably effectiv disruptiv force in the Presbyterian fold.

It appears to us that the champions of Dr. Briggs are indiscreet, if not reckless. If they withhold their contributions from the Tract Society because its secretary is opposed to the ideas of Dr. Briggs, what are they going to do about the leaflets, tracts, and books issued by that society? Behind Dr. Shearer is that mighty mass of doctrinal literature. It sustains him as he defends it. Logically, the progressists are committed against this theological output by their fealty to Briggs. If the heretic is right those exegetical documents are all wrong, and they cannot, as consistent and honest men, consent to their further circulation. And, be sure, they will not be allowed to lose sight of this fact. The thin end of the wedge has been forced into the Calvinistic log, and it will be driven home to the head by men who call themselvs Christians.

Will Dr. Briggs's wealthy backers continue their benefactions to the American Bible Society? Why should they and how can they? The book it publishes and scatters by the millions pronounces a curse upon those who add to or take from it. Dr. Briggs has done both, and for this Dr. Shearer condemns him. Because the latter does this the society which he represents is placed under a ban by certain Presbyterians, the supporters of Dr. Briggs. How can they consistently help put into the hands of the elect and the unsaved a book which is the cause of all this controversy, and which the man whose attitude toward it they defend has declared to be sailing under false colors?

The Spirit of Persecution is Not Dead.

Dr. José Llunas, editor of La Tramontana, Barcelona, Spain, has been sentenced to three years' imprisonment for publishing anti-religious ideas in his paper. No doubt those who inflicted this atrocious sentence upon the independent Spanish editor sadly regretted their inability to stretch him upon the rack or chain him to the stake. It is no libel upon these men to write this, for when censors set out with the intention to prevent the dissemination of unorthodox opinions the logic of their position forces them on step by step, from greater to greater cruelties, so long as their victim retains life and remains "contumacious." Nothing but their own weakness, that is, their inability to get the proscriptiv laws they want, limits their destructivness. What religious tyrants hav done and are doing in Spain, religious, moral, and economic tyrants will do in America and every other country where they can attain power. No prudent man or woman will giv any encouragement to the persecuting spirit, no matter how plausible the pretexts of those under its maleficent influence.

It is folly to expect that the believers in the gospel of exclusiv salvation will not persecute in this age of knowledge and liberty. This is not an age of knowledge and liberty because they hav desired it to be such, nor because they hav made it such—they of to-day and their religious ancestors. They love knowledge—so much as makes their creedsmen more efficient supporters of the faith than they would be without it. They love liberty—their own. Those Liberals only who are not acquainted with the literature of modern militant Christianity take an optimistic view of the immediate future. There is not the least doubt that we are face to face with an enemy which is determined to make heresy a legal offense and to punish it as a crime. The theocratic party is intensely in earnest, aggressiv, unscrupulous, and constantly growing in boldness and numbers.

Our republic is secular by the intention of its founders (not by the intention of the founders of some of the colonies) and in theory, but in practice it is largely theocratic. As President S. F. Scovel says, "the salt of evangelical Christianity lay thickly at the nation's roots, and savored the nation's life." The simile is ominous. Salt kills vegetation, and the salt of Christianity will kill this nation if we permit it to be spread much more thickly at the roots of the governmental tree. President Scovel mentions as among the costly jewels which America inherits from its "historic past," "laws to condemn blasphemy and honor the Sabbath." The whole burden of President Scovel's address is that America must officially recognize Christianity that it may be true to that dark and terrible "historic past," at whose memory merciful and just men turn pale and tremble and cry out in anguish of soul. It seems impossible for the theocrats to conceive of mental growth. They ever look longingly back toward the intolerant and bloody ages of religious politics. They sigh for the old blasphemy statutes. Sunday laws are not enough. Giv them the national Sunday law for which they are striving, and they will, with augmented arrogance, clamor for blasphemy edicts, laws confiscating the property of dissenters, and all other laws that they may think necessary to enable them to kill Freethought.

And in the light of all we know of the crimes possible through such legislation, we are rebuked because we are not willing to help these religious malcontents submit their pet measures to a vote of the people! As though it were the right of the people to vote to enslave a part of themselvs!

The Funeral of General Trumbull.

The Open Court of May 17 is a Trumbull memorial number. It is draped in mourning and contains a full report of all that was said at the funeral of the great humanitarian, with some other matter. The words of farewell uttered at the house are given, followed by the sermon at Unity church (the name of the minister is not given); "The Lion and the Lamb Blended," address by George A. Schilling, commissioner of Labor, of Illinois; "Moral Courage Rarer than Physical Bravery," address by Clarence S. Darrow, lawyer and literary writer; "The Saxon," address by Geo. E. Gooch, of St. George's Benevolent Association of Chicago, of which General Trumbull was president-elect; and "Integer Vitae," adapted from Horace and sung by the Lotus Quartette. Upon the coffin was placed a copy of "Wheelbarrow," with an "envoy" written on the fly-leaf. Following these tributes came the services of the Grand Army of the Republic, consisting of its ritual; "A Tribute to the Old Soldier," address by Col. James A Sexton; "Farewell, Comrade," recited by Charles E. St. Clair, and "Tenting on the Old Camp-Ground," sung by the Lotus Quartette.

The interment took place at Rosehill Cemetery. Fir branches were laid on the open grave, and the words of farewell uttered.

In conclusion, Thomas J. McCormack writes of "General Trumbull's Connection with the Open Court." The last paragraph of this tender and truthful tribute we reproduce below:

"Here he applied those powers of wit, humor, and sarcasm which were his richest patrimony, to the castigation of snobbery, vice, and hypocrisy in every form, drawing from an inexhaustible wealth of anecdote, which only such a life could hav gathered, the illustrations which gave force, light, and beauty to all that he said. He furnished, too—what must never be forgotten—one of the first noteworthy examples of that rarest of national qualities which Matthew Arnold said our country so sadly lacked, fearless and searching self-criticism. His discernment for national conceits and Chauvinistic illusions was unexampled, and his lash, when once he caught a lurking vanity or folly, was merciless. His utterances were read and quoted from one end of this country to the other. Many in authority hav acted more wisely because of his sayings, and many of us not in authority hav learned to think more justly and unselfishly of our national and social conditions. In this respect, at a time when such work is so much needed, his death must be mourned as a public loss, reaching far beyond the gap which the silence of his pen will leave in the hearts of the readers of the Open Court."

It is painfully true that Matthew Arnold was right in his estimate of our inability to be other than patriotic partisans. The English radicals hav never failed to fearlessly criticise the follies and wickedness of their rulers and to unsparingly condemn the jingoism and crimes of the foreign office of their government. General Trumbull was an Englishman by birth and training, and the noble scorn of wrongs committed against the weak which was so characteristic of Bradlaugh was also in the blood of his fellow-countryman, who made such a splendid record in America, and whose untimely death we so much deplore to-day. We do indeed need "fearless and searching self-criticism," and Matthew Mark Trumbull taught us by precept and example how to apply it keenly, kindly and effectivly.

The following donations for the purposes of the Freethought Federation are acknowledged: M. S. Hayhurst, 50 cents; S. Brewer, $1; W. L. Wever, $2; W. T. Galloway, $1; Jno. M. Maxfield, $1; Cyrille Lacrosse, $1; L. C. Geertson, $5.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is sent for one year, with a copy of Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," for $6.50. If your cash order reaches us before the last form of the book goes to press, your name will be engrossed on its pages among those of the elect of Freethought.

There seems to be an opening for the juvenil unemployed in Chicago. The Western Methodist Episcopal Sunday-school offers to pay for new pupils, on the basis of the following wage scale: One new pupil, a new Methodist catechism; two pupils, ten cents extra for the first Sunday; three pupils, fifteen cents; and five cents for each additional pupil. This should stimulate all workers to bring at least two pupils so as to get the money to act as antidote to the catechism, the latter being given to all those who secure recruits.

If you want to be prepared for heaven in the best style and at no pecuniary cost to yourself just kill somebody. And don't work for a reprieve or pardon, for that might put your immortal soul in peril. Here are two cases in point, vide the Sydney Bulletin:

"Parson Campbell, who wrote to the papers explaining that Mrs. Knorr ought to be hanged because 'she was now resigned,' recalls an old story of little Father Lordon, Roman Catholic chaplain in Melbourne jail long ago—a condemned criminal whom his reverence had made 'perfectly resigned,' was reprieved at the last moment. 'Ah,' sighed the priest, 'I am not so very pleased after all—he will never be so well prepared again.'"

Dr. Henry M. Field says that Dr. Shearer, of the American Tract Society, "is so possessed with the idea that he is called of God to regulate all the affairs of the church that he has ended by becoming a general meddler and mischief-maker." No doubt, and there are ever so many Christians who are positiv that they are "called of God to regulate all the affairs of" society and they "hav ended by becoming general" meddlers and mischief-makers. Of such are the Dows, Gerrys, Brittons, Comstocks, Parkhursts, Crafts, and McAllisters. They are the buffalo gnats and gadflies of our social and political life, leaving a drop of poison in every wound they make.

The Letter-Writing Corps will this week send their communications to United States Senators George F. Hoar, Arthur P. Gorman, and George G. Vest. Senators Vest and Gorman take the position that church fair games of chance should not be subject to the provisions of the anti-lottery law. Senator Hoar thinks that the law should make no exceptions in their favor, but he says that the state laws are never enforced against the churches and he intimates that the national law will not be. Point out to these senators that the churches hav no right to claim exemption from the operation of the laws, and that such favoritism is particularly obnoxious when, as in this case, they are clamorous for the enactment of the law and its enforcement against other gamblers. All laws should be general and uniform. See the leading editorial in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 19th.

We mailed last week to each Senator and Representativ in Congress a copy of a sixteen-page protest against the Gallinger-Morse and Kyle-Johnson Sunday bills now pending in the national legislature. With each package was inclosed a copy of Louis Levine's admirable letter to the members of the committees to which the bills were referred. These will also be sent to the most influential papers of the country. The Protest pamphlet sells for five cents; twenty-five copies, three cents each; one hundred copies, $2. It should be widely distributed. The people must be educated that the Sunday tyrants may be thwarted.

Christianity has always had a keen nostril for blood. The foundation stories of its temple of superstition were cemented with the blood of a god slain for that very purpose, and the blood of heretics has dripped from its garments on every stairway up which the race has struggled under grievous burdens and in agony of spirit and body. The knife of sacrifice has never been dry. The altar of oblation has not once been free from the crimson stain. What wonder, then, that a new paper in Canada is named The Voice of the Precious Blood! It is edited and published by the "Sisters of the Precious Blood." Those dear women must be sanguinary in disposition or they would not choose such a gory corporate name. But it is eminently in keeping with the origin and history of their religion.

Rev. Stopford Brooke, recently preaching in London about the "laborer's bondage and resurrection," referred to the sojourn of the Jews in Egypt and their deliverance by "God." Among other things he said:

"An immense wardrobe of the garments of myth and legend was made wherewith to clothe the event of the Exodus and the figure of Moses. Poet after poet, patriot after patriot, story teller after story teller, took up the old tale. What happened to Arthur of Britain happened to the Moses of Israel. We do not preach it as a true history, we preach on it as a story."

The tale of the resurrection of Jesus is adverted to as "the resurrection of the soul of humanity—for the time." What a trifling with "sacred" things it is to call this sort of pleasant talk about admitted legends and myths the preaching of Christianity! Why do such men as Stopford Brooke continue to masquerade under the Christian name? They are merely playing at teaching religion.

"Church Property" is now ready, and all accumulated orders are receiving prompt attention. The members of the Constitutional Convention and the press of New York will, of course, be supplied gratis. We shall also put as many copies as possible into the hands of other persons who hav influence to secure justice in taxation. How many copies are thus distributed will depend upon the assistance we receive from the working Liberals of the country. All Freethinkers who can should also buy "Church Property," and distribute it among their own lawmakers, editors, and thoughtful private citizens. We hav made the price very low for so large a pamphlet. Fifteen cents per single copy, ten copies for $1, fifty copies for $4.50, and one hundred copies for $8; postage paid in all cases. Let there be this year in every state and territory in the Union a campaign of education. Show the people the immorality, injustice, and danger of the exemption of church property from taxation.

Rev. Robert S. McArthur, of Calvary Baptist church, in this city, recently said:

"Within the term of my pastorate the Catholic church has received from the general fund in this city the vast sum of $1,213,000. During that same period all the churches of Protestant denominations hav received but the insignificant sum of $75,000.

No wonder Dr. McArthur wants the sixteenth amendment to the state Constitution. He sees and feels that $1,213,000 to the Catholics and only $75,000 to the Protestants is not a fair division of the spoils. It is not so much the fact that the Catholics got so large an amount, but that the Protestants received only that "insignificant sum," that pinches the Baptist foot. The chances are ten to one that if the positions of the Catholics and Protestants had been reversed we should hear precious little from the latter about the sixteenth amendment. We hav the best of reasons for entertaining this opinion. If these Protestant ministers were sincerely opposed to state favors to the church they would rise as one man against religious instruction in the public schools, against Sunday laws, against church control of the education of the Indians, against chaplaincies, and against all the other church-state abominations.

The Independent sends out a little leaflet in praise of the model religious newspaper. We subjoin a part of one paragraph, substituting for the original the words in brackets:

"The education of your children you cannot afford to abridge; the support of your [Liberal society] and its various lines of work you must not lessen; and your [Freethought] newspaper, the cheapest and one of the most useful and valuable things you get, it would be folly to sacrifice. It is worth to you many times the sum you pay for it. It will reimburse you in manifold forms, again and again—in recreation, instruction, suggestion, encouragement, improvement. It is a silent, but constant and powerful influence for good. You need the food it provides for [the] mind and [sympathies] as much as you need meat and bread and drink for your physical welfare."

All this is right to the point. Our lecturers tell us that where the model Freethought paper is taken there they find interest, enthusiasm, helpfulness. The Liberal who does not take and read at least one good Freethought paper is not a well-informed Liberal. He cannot be, for the one all-sufficient reason that no other class of papers can giv him the news of the Liberal, religiously progressiv world. At all events, no other does. No other papers can keep him in touch with the vanguard of the army of liberty. No others are vigilant to warn him of the encroachments of theological meddlers and tyrants.

The Sunday Moloch is the coming king of America. Everywhere the law-makers are prostrating themselvs in the dust at the feet of the hideous idol, while the people crowd insanely about, eager to lay their most precious liberties in its outstretched arms, to pass thence into the flaming hell of its compassionless bowels. The Canadian parliament is seemingly ready to surrender to the priests of Moloch, and if it does there can be no doubt that our Congress will be encouraged thereby to go in the same evil way. A bill is now before the Canadian parliament, and has already passed its second reading in the lower house, which forbids "the publishing of Sunday newspapers, the running of local freight or passenger trains and excursions, either by railway or steamer, and requires the closing of the government canals, from 6 A.M. to 9 P.M. on Sunday." This infamous measure in some respects out-Herods the Kyle bill. Of course the Canadian Presbyterians are eagerly working for the adoption of the bill, so as to stop "the increasing Sabbath desecration," as the Christian Statesman puts it. This is not on the hypocritical plea of "rest," you will see, but frankly for religious ends; that is, for priestly emoluments. What are the Canadian Freethinkers and Jews doing in this crisis? Secular Thought could make a determined fight.

There seems to be a number of Comstocks and Chases in Glasgow. We learn in the news of the day that the chief constable lately visited the picture sellers of that city of piety and strong whisky and ordered them not to display for sale several famous masterpieces of art, among them these:

"The Bath of Physche," by Sir Frederick Leighton; "Diana and Endymion," by George F. Watts; "A Visit to Esculapius," by A. J. Poynter; "Syrinx," by Arthur Hacker, and "Orpheus" and "The Judgment of Paris," by S. J. Solomon,

The "New Orthodoxy" has for its shibboleth this: "The human body is shameful and corrupting; whoever paints or sculptures it is a lascivious knave, and whoever beholds the picture or statue is on the road to hell without a return ticket." This miserable sentiment is a survival of the blighting anti-naturalism of medieval Christianity. That was a form of morbid insanity and not until we hav outgrown the last trace of its influence shall we be healthy and sane. Comstock and these Glasgow censors remind us of the monk of the Middle Ages who refused to carry his mother across a stream lest, touching her, his soul should be contaminated. Of course, he was already unspeakably filthy in both body and mind.

A writer in one of the dailies describes the expositions now open in Antwerp, Lyons, Milan and San Francisco. Much is said of the scientific and industrial displays at these places. Then he adverts to the Paris exposition which will be opened in 1900, and tells us something of the preparations made for that great event. He closes with these words:

"Mankind has been notified of its approach in order that the whole world may get ready for the 'inauguration of the twentieth century,' which, it is hoped, will be the most glorious century since the creation of Adam."

Now, what in the name of history, science and common sense has the "creation of Adam" to do with an exhibition of the products of human invention and labor? Every person of education and intelligence, including the writer of the article in question, knows that the "creation of Adam" is as purely mythical as the loves and wars of the Greek divinities. Why all this deceiving cant? Why this perpetual reference to a legend as though it were a verifiable and verified event? Why this masking of the lie in the garments of history? Cannot men write of the affairs of the people of this world and of to-day without making a parenthetical apology to the shades of the dead ages for daring to mention the triumphs of labor and learning which hav driven primitive concepts out of the minds of the leaders of the race, and substituted the printing press for the rack, the electric motor for the stake?

By the consensus of opinion of the more intelligent friends of the labor cause on the Pacific Coast Carl Browne is no credit to that cause, and his talk about being a reincarnation of "Christ" is very wearying, but what can we expect when the reporters and editors persist in designating that talk as "blasphemous"? So long as the people pay for papers which take for granted that there is such a thing as "blasphemy" so long will there be Carl Brownes to take advantage of that ignorance and make money and gain notoriety by posing as "Christs" and uttering such "blasphemies" as the penny-a liners discover in the speeches and proclamations of Browne. When Browne was up for sentence in Washington the other day he compared the jury which convicted him to those who are said to hav crucified Jesus, whereat the correspondents raised their hands in horror, rolled their eyes in simulated piety, and shrieked in chorus, "Blasphemy!" Granted that such a man as Jesus was crucified for the offense alleged by the Bible writers, what then? Only this: A man was unjustly condemned. This is what Browne claims was done in his case. He compared the two events and the persons responsible for the wrongs committed. Where was the "blasphemy"? There was none, of course. The reportorial barnstormers were merely playing to the gallery gods. It was probably thought that such a charge would create prejudice against the adventurer in the minds of the ultra pious.

The Paine celebration is near at hand, and as this is the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER that will reach our readers before the 30th, the Brooklyn Philosophical Association wishes all to know what a treat is in store for those who attend. As they hav chartered a special train which will leave the Grand Central Depot, New York, on May 30th at 12.30 P.M., every one is asked to be at the station before that time, so that all may go together. To those who may not be acquainted with New York we will say that the Grand Central Depot may be reached by taking the Third avenue elevated cars and getting off at Forty-second street. As to the speakers: Henry Rowley, President of the Association, will manage affairs and speak in his usual brilliant, witty, and captivating manner. Samuel P. Putnam has written a poem for the occasion; Thaddeus B. Wakeman, always scientific and positiv, will deliver an oration; Joseph Warwick, logical and serious, will try to outdo himself on this great occasion, and Wilson Macdonald will do his share to amuse and instruct. Round trip tickets, 50 cents.

Every person who goes is requested to take some flowers with which to help decorate the monument of Thomas Paine. Thus each silently pays a tribute to the exalted worth of the man whose memory we revere. Your presence will be a testimony as eloquent as the words of the orator, as Joseph Warwick well says. Let us do our best in the matter, and make this celebration the greatest and grandest ever held.

The PAINE MEMORIAL NUMBER (June 2d) is being largely ordered for distribution. There is yet time, if you hurry in your orders, to secure a supply. The number will be copiously illustrated and will contain a great variety of the very best reading matter pertaining to Paine, his life and work. It will embrace commendations of the character and services of the Author-Hero, from the pens of his contemporaries and of writers of later times, selections from his works, original poems by Geo. E. Macdonald and Samuel P. Putnam, and much other excellent mental sustenance. See advertisment on page 336.

Here is what one of our most intelligent and helpful Freethinkers thinks of the MEMORIAL NUMBER:

DEAR MR. MACDONALD: "Order now" is good Anglo-Saxon; at any rate, short and to the point. And when it refers to your special THOMAS PAINE MEMORIAL to be issued June 2d, I am in it at once, and for a round one hundred copies. You shall hav the little list.

Now, pardon my presumption, Friend Reader, but may I ask hav you made up your little list? I fancy Mr. Macdonald is just looking right at you. He is ready and smiling. Send him the stamps and names.

It does seem not any will neglect this chance; not one who happens to know how this good, honest name has been vilified from one generation to another. Sound the tocsin for justice, justice, justice! Be it your duty to make these defamers reap what they hav infamously sown. A whirlwind on their baseless calumnies!

One extra copy if no more. Place it. Let it bear testimony! The truth stands firm. It will prevail. Try to speed that day.

Again, your papers, should they not hav your loyal support? Surely. Yours truly, LOUIS LEVINE.

No church is tolerant when it has the power to be safely intolerant. Religionists coo as softly as doves when they are in a hopeless minority, but giv them the reins of state and they become ravening eagles, fierce of eye and "red in beak and claw." In the United States the Roman Catholic church has much to say about religious liberty and the fraternity of acceptors of divergent creeds, but in Nicaragua another note is sounded. Recently when the colporteurs of the American Bible Society reached the city of Leon they found the following notice posted:

"The wolf of Protestantism has found its way into the Catholic flock. A minister of the sect of Luther and Voltaire is in Leon, accompanied by various mercenaries, who are busy selling in the streets Protestant Bibles and a false book of the gospels. Do not buy these books, Christians. Scorn these propagandists of a sect divorced from the Catholic church of Jesus Christ, divorced from the truth, and which is resolved on depriving us of the most precious legacy received from our forefathers. Do not allow your religion to be harmed by these knight-errants of evil. Let us hurl them away. No law authorizes their coming here to dechristianize us. Liberty of worship does not exist here, and these peddlers of adulterated Bibles are of a foreign flock. Nicaragua belongs to God; Protestantism to the devil. Away with them.

"N. B.—According to the laws of the church anyone who keeps these books incurs excommunication. All who hav copies ought to destroy them or deliver them to the church court. Moreover, all persons incur excommunication who directly protect these Lutheran adventurers in their work or listen to their preaching."

The "sect of Luther and Voltaire" is gently commended to the Protestant brethren hereabouts. But the Nicaraguan Catholics are right in one thing: The coming of the Protestant is the beginning of "dechristianization." It is a far cry from St. Augustine and the popes to Büchner, Bradlaugh, and Clifford, and between those heresiarchs of faith and unfaith Luther, Wesley, and Briggs, the apostles of hybridism, stumble doubtingly and deviously along.

Wanted—More Subscribers.

We solicit the kind attention of our friends to the need which exists of increasing the subscription list of THE TRUTH SEEKER. There are several reasons for this, which our readers will readily see First, It will do a world of good, by making more Liberals and by interesting those already liberal in the work of Freethought. The church is making great encroachments upon our liberties, and the people need to know about it, in order to defeat its tyranny. And those who read THE TRUTH SEEKER are a hundred times more interested and activ than those who do not. Second, It is a duty we owe to our fellow-men to giv them the light of reason we hav obtained. Liberalism makes for true civilization, and freedom from fear of an angry God makes men happier and better. Every Liberal should do all he can to lift up his neighbors from the darkness of superstition to the glorious plain of mental liberty. And, as Mr. Wakeman says, referring to the resolution regarding the Liberal papers passed at the late International Congress: "They are the very life of the cause of intellectual and practical emancipation of the people. As such they are to be built up and sustained by constant care, payment, encouragement, and solicitation for subscribers for them." Third, An increase in the list will relieve the readers from the occasional "duns" we are compelled to send out in order to get money with which to pay bills. If we can obtain two or three thousand new subscribers, the increased revenue will make the business work of the paper easier, and we can continue to improve the paper without fear of financial embarrassments.

To reward those who will do a little for us in this matter we hav arranged to take a large number of Mr. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," and to every one who sends us four new yearly subscribers at the regular rates of $3 ($12 in all), we shall send a copy of that magnificent work free. Those who send the club before the book is on the press will be enrolled among the original subscribers and patrons in the book.

And to make it easy to get these four new subscribers we will offer them as a premium either of two splendid works—The "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated," or W. S. Bell's "Handbook of Freethought" in cloth binding Our readers know the value of these books, and that about every Liberal in the country would like a copy of one of the other. Either one of these, as may be chosen, will be given to the new subscribers obtained in these clubs of four, and a copy of "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" to the one who gets up the club and sends the money and names.

We cannot afford to make this premium to single subscribers, but to enable old subscribers and single new subscribers to obtain these and other desirable works at a great reduction, we hav made a list of premiums in connection with subscriptions to the paper, to be found in the first column of the first editorial page of THE TRUTH SEEKER. We are willing to do our part toward making the obtaining of good Liberal works easy and cheap, and hope our readers will take advantage of the terms offered.

Once more we ask that a favorable eye be turned in our direction, and a helpful hand extended. As the resolutions of the International Congress expressed it, Boom the Liberal papers and you boom the Liberal cause.

Oh, the gentle amenities of Christian journalism! Here is the Christian Advocate, of Richmond, referring to the eminent Presbyterian divine, Dr. J. H. Barrows, the chief promoter of the World's Parliament of Religions, as "the Rev. Balaam Barrows," and accusing him of being "a specimen of the modern Iscariot, selling his soul and his Savior for shekels of silver." Next appears the Presbyterian, of Philadelphia, alluding, with grave courtesy and gentlemanly refinement, to Monsignor Satolli as "the Imperial Dago"! How fraternal and polite!

"And his [Gladstone's] religion—so deep, so pervading, so obvious, so instinctiv in him—seems to go back, far behind all the man's questions and perplexities. It is utterly undisturbed. It springs out of the natural convictions of the heart, with that simplicity and directness which belong to those who hav never traveled far from God. It is not the religiousness to which a man has fought his way by desperate struggles; but rather the religiousness which would be our natural habit, if only we had kept our first freshness."—Canon Scott-Holland.

"Freshness" is good, decidedly pat. "If only we had kept our first freshness," Canon Scott-Holland and Mr. Gladstone would never hav got beyond the intellectual and ethical status of the Australian Bushman, nay, they would be treading paths of development behind those of the Chimpanzee.

A boy living in Brooklyn writes to the World that the prohibition of Sunday ball playing is the torment of his life. He says that he works six days and Sunday is his only time for outdoor life and recreation. If he plays in a vacant lot he runs the risk of being grabbed by the police, put in a cell, and held for trial Monday morning. This makes him late for his work and he may be discharged. If he plays in the street he incurs the same dangers. If he hangs around the corners he may be arrested for lounging. He sarcastically observes that he surmises that the good people want him in church all day Sunday so he can be at liberty and not out in the street where he might fall into the hands of the police and be imprisoned. Of course the Sunday-law zealots are indifferent to all the suffering they cause by their irrational laws, and seem too blind to see that they are simply recruiting the armies of vagabondage and crime.

Many of our contemporaries persist in giving currency to the story that W. C. P. Breckinridge was the leading counsel for the prosecution in the trial of Professor Briggs for heresy. He had nothing to do with that trial. It was a relativ of his who on that occasion led the attack on the "higher criticism," and God killed him for it; that is, he died the same day, and as not even an English sparrow can fall without God's connivance, and as he "doeth all things well," there can be no doubt that he slew Lawyer Breckinridge, and for some good purpose; probably as an "awful example" to the old fogies of orthodoxy. As to W. C. P. B., it is equally clear that he is a special favorit of "Le Bon Dieu's," for does not "the Bible" say that "whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth"? In Miss Pollard's fate we see another verification of the truth of "Holy Writ," wherein it is declared that "it is impossible but that offenses will come [to Brother Breckinridge] but woe unto him [or her] through whom they come."

One Anthony Comstock, an unsavory character of this city, has just broken out in one of his ungovernable "must" spells, like the late Tip of the Central Park menagerie, under the operation of the law of like causes and like effects. He is the censor of our literature and art, and his present pet antipathy is Fielding's classic, "Tom Jones," which he declares must no longer be sold. The New York Times tremblingly deprecates the contemplated vandalism, taking care to prepare the way for its mild criticism by considerable probably insincere and certainly ridiculous talk about the spy's good intentions and his general "well-doing" and "well-deservings." There is much of this nauseating stuff in the Times editorial which we will not weary our readers by reproducing, but we hav to agree with it in its statement that "more literary knowledge and taste" should be possessed by a censor. Confessedly Comstock is not blessed by a modicum of either. The Times cites the fact that James Russell Lowell thought so well of "Tom Jones" as "to deliver in Westminster Abbey a eulogy upon its author, which was heard with satisfaction by an assemblage of the most distinguished and cultivated Englishmen." The Times adds:

"The awful dilemma is presented to us that either Mr. Lowell was a perverter of youth or Mr. Comstock does not know much about literature. It would be very interesting to know upon what grounds he justifies the suppression of Fielding, while he permits the English Bible and Shakspere to be sold without even a protest."

Why he does this is very clear; he dare not attack the Bible, because it is the Christian's fetich, and Shakspere has too many friends among all classes to make it an inviting object of persecution. Comstock's love of virtue is not fanatical; he has no desire to assault a superior force, nor an equal force.

Liverpool is not adding anything to her fame lately, although her city council is succeeding in making her notorious for bigotry, as she was already for "drink, prostitution, and rowdyism," as the Freethinker phrases it. The Liverpool branch of the National Secular Society wanted the Annual Conference of the Society held in Liverpool this year, and they needed a larger hall for the evening session than the one where they meet regularly. So they applied for the use of Picton Lecture Hall, on the usual terms, that hall being town property. On former occasions Hanley and Birmingham had allowed their town halls to be used by the Secular Society. But the Library Committee refused the application. Then the president of the Branch, Mr. L. Small, complained to the city council, while a Mr. Stafford begged the council to sustain the committee. The newspapers published Mr. Stafford's letter in full but refused to giv a word of the Freethinker's. The refusal to let the Secularists hav the hall was based on the plea that it would not do to consent to such a profanation of the Sabbath! When the matter came before the city council Mr. Taggart, an Irishman and a Roman Catholic, moved an amendment to the committee's adverse report. He said there was no reason why the Secularists should not hav the hall, upon payment of the usual charge. He made a strong speech in support of his amendment. It was hypocrisy of the worst kind, he said, to refuse the society the use of the hall on Sunday, but to permit them to hav it on any other day. His motion was rejected by a vote of thirty-four to five. Even the Unitarians refused to giv the Freethinkers fair play. What are the lessons of this? One, certainly, should be perfectly clear to all, and that is, that we must judge men by what they do, not by what they profess. We can not, in justice, run amuck among the members of any particular church. Service of liberty is the paramount consideration and the title to respect.

A Dogmatic Reminiscence.

The division of the Presbyterian church in America took place in 1838. The old-school party excinded a portion of the new-school churches for heresy. In the winter of 1839–40 I boarded in the house of the Rev. James I. Ostrom, pastor of a new-school Presbyterian church in New York city. He was a delegate to the General Assembly in Philadelphia when the rupture occurred. I heard him describe the scene. A resolution was before the body enunciating the Calvinistic dogmas. The object was to corner the Northern new-school heretics. A champion of the latter party arose, and in manifest irony said:

"Mr. Moderator, I move to amend the resolution by adding thereto the following:
"1. Men are punished for Adam's sin.
"2. Man has no ability to serve God, and
"3. The atonement is limited to the elect."

Up rose the most distinguished old school member, Robert J. Breckinridge D. D., father of Congressman Breckinridge of Kentucky, and said:

"Mr. Moderator, the amendment proposed embodies cardinal doctrins of our church, which we are all bound to maintain."

Washington, D. C. W. H. BURR.

It is a good thing for modern civilization that curiosity is not now punished as formerly by changing inquirers into pillars of salt. In that event salt would be a drug on the market and brains would be as rare as they were when the angels rode winged horses to fight the devil.

"Trust in the Lord with all thine heart; and lean not unto thine understanding." sayeth our dear heavenly father. Only Infidels do that. If any of us question any of the dear Lord's methods of compelling people to glorify him we are liable to make him mad and thus bring a famin or flood, or cholera, or some other terrible judgment upon the whole neighborhood.

The Gods Under Fire.

If the universe has a godhead, he is not under fire. The man-made gods are those to whom our criticism relates, and all others are not in terms of affirmation or negation by us. The Jewish god and the three Christian's gods with one head are one and the same. They are allied in the sacred book from whence we derive our information of them. These are the gods whom we impeach. These gods are clothed with attributes such as render them perfect in every particular. They are set forth by their devotees in the drapery of infinit power, wisdom, and goodness. If such gods stand out at the head of this universe thus invested, then this universe, controled by them, invites criticism under their management; and in this criticism we convict these gods of all which has written the history of this world in the terms of misery. Every page of written and unwritten history will emphasize an impeachment of the most criminal character against these gods. Can a rational basis be conceived upon which we can explain a single chapter in the life of the race on this globe under the guidance of these gods which does not imply criminality? The entire plan and method of this world in the light of infinit power, wisdom, and goodness is a burlesque upon these so-called Divine attributes. No one fact can be cited which is not in direct contradiction to the possession of any such distinguishing attributes such as are assigned to these gods—nothing in the universe which for a moment will sustain this absurd claim. We convict these gods upon the plea that the world which they hav created flatly denies that it came from any such source, guided by the aforesaid attributes, seeing that the creation itself reveals no indication that any such marks are written upon it which even suggest any such origin. Infinit power is not manifest. Infinit wisdom is nowhere to be seen, but quite otherwise. Much less is there any indication of infinit goodness. A plea may entreat for the eternal fitness of things, but in that fitness, if it has any existence at all, it nowhere suggests either of these attributes. We see no such thing, no such image anywhere, or anything in nature or life. No such thought is ever intimated by anything we see, feel, or hear in nature or in the life of any form or forms upon this globe. When we come to specialize, we will see with still greater force how infamously absurd are all of the pleadings made in the interest of such a God or Gods, with the attributes which hav been assigned to them. Legitimate criticism will leave no place for a doubt to hang upon that this world is managed by no such personality or power such as we find ignorant and superstitious devotees claiming. The bill of indictment which we make against these gods, these man-made gods—and in our necessary limitations we can know no others—is this: The fundamental attributes with which the Jewish and the Christian gods are invested are those which we hav named, and also several others, which this criticism does not require us to mention. If those named can be vindicated, the remainder will also be vindicated. These attributes are predicated of these gods—and their rights must be in harmony with these predications—hence it is that we submit the following facts to the readers of this paper for their candid meditation. What is there in nature which can for a moment claim an existence under such provisions as these attributes imply? Nature's revelations hav no ethics, no morality, no value weighed in the scale of virtue. But these attributes must of strict necessity invest everything under their control with ethical and moral value. But when this world and the things which are in it are seen in the light of a critical analysis, we find at every step evidence which demands an impeachment of him invested with these attributes. A criminal intent, or want of intention, is everywhere manifest in this world. No field of investigation or thought which does not set forth in the strongest terms possible mismanagement and misrule; nothing that will justify the inference that a being as defined in the possession of these attributes has anything to do with the management of this world.

Upon the hypothesis of infinit power, wisdom, and goodness, what impressiv lessons this world in which we liv suggests! Recognized as a home for rational beings such as we are, it is in almost every particular supremely unsuited for such beings. Take it as it was when man first came upon it, what a horrid place for the rearing of men, women, and babes! Torn and wracked by its own convulsions for millions of years, rendering large areas of it uninhabitable through their eternal cold, while other regions are filled with death and pestilential vapors through their overburdening heat—where gestation of vipers, loathsome and slimy reptils, venomous crawling and flying forms, is going on until the hour of parturition comes, and then the air is filled with miasma, and these disgusting creatures join with the gods in the offering of an im m insult to the dignity of man when he is advised that this world was made for his abode! These rocky, barren wastes, impassable deserts, and swampy, impenetrable wildernesses full of disease in all places accessible to man, waiting his coming! Poisonous vines and shrubs, thorns, briers, weeds and thistles; flies to torment; bugs, snakes, serpents, and bloody teeth to bite, to slay and devour those for whom this home was made!

Only a small part of this earth is fit for the habitation of human beings. It is an insult to man to offer him the world as his home with the plea that a God of infinit power, wisdom, and goodness created it—a gift which dignity spurns. But then, probably it was as good as the idea the gods entertained of the men, women, and babes they intended to place upon it. There were thousands of years of savage men under divine guidance before a decent or civilized man appeared. The gods hav ever shown a preference for barbarians. They hav had about a thousand savages to one civilized person, and I think that if they had had their way this world would still be without a decent man or woman in it. If a civilized man or woman had been in the mind of the Infinit, it does not seem that two or three hundred thousand years should hav been given to savagery before one was produced. But he is here in spite of the gods, and he is here to stay until nature decides his destiny.

Could these things hav been, had infinit power, wisdom, and goodness been on duty? How could this world hav had a savage history to fill every age of sentient life if the pleadings of superstition are true? The historic life of man upon this globe is offered in evidence against a management of his career under the enthronement of these attributes. The life of man is an impeachment of the infinit power, wisdom, and goodness of the gods. Think of the billions of human beings in the suffering and torturing centuries, the dreadful calamities that hav crossed the pathway of man, the awful agonies which hav been endured by him and which can not be stated in the terms of human speech. The brain becomes weary and the eyes fill with tears as in thought we confront the dreadful history of human woe and misery. How the heart of sympathy is wrung as we think our way through the terrible past, so filled with grief and sorrow, wailings and deep despair; pleadings for help; hungry, starving famishing, dying for want of bread; tearful, beseeching eyes, longing for a word of love or kindness; battling against the foam and dash af the fatal wave; fleeing for life from the fangs of God's venomous reptils and the bloody teeth of his wild, voracious beasts. Man cries aloud for help, for the howling tornado has torn to atoms the home of his wife and babes, but the cry is unheard, or heard only by his fellow-sufferers. Gods do not follow up their desolations with mercy. On the trail of his destroying angels, Tempest and Flood, swift follow plague, pestilence, and famin. How useless it is to repeat the story of a divine reign manifesting infinit power, wisdom, and goodness, in the face of life's history upon this globe! No rational creature unbound by superstition can for a mement entertain the thought that a God of love and tenderness could see all this misery and not die of a broken heart. The sorrow of such a sight would cause him to weep out his infinit eyes or to become a raving maniac. No life of love and sympathy could survive the horrid sight, seen at a glance, of all that humanity has suffered.

If such a God exists, invested with the attribues named, he stands impeached, convicted, and condemned for the violation of every principle of justice known to man. He is an ethical and moral imbecil. Not a single element of right, honor, or equity is anywhere to be seen in the history of his relations to the human race, or to any form of life upon this globe. A world constructed upon the plan that one half of sentient life must be sacrificed to sustain the other half is evidence, which cannot well be strengthened, against the notion of rule by anyone having the attributes of power, wisdom, and goodness. No speech can be invented to express the infamy of such a creation. Any system which admits of a parasite doomed by the terms of its existence to feed on the quivering flesh, tissues, bones, ligaments, and fibers of human beings—planting therein the seeds of sickness and death, and the susceptibility of an organism to yield tc its disadvantage to any form of force or life which may invade it—all arrangements whereby conditions are fixed in the terms of its existence so as to necessitate direct or indirect harm to any other form of sentient life, is criminal in the eyes of either infinit or finite wisdom and goodness. All pain, direct or indirect, in a world ruled by such potencies as are under consideration must, in the nature of all that is moral and just, be criminal—supremely and infinitly criminal. No pleadings can alter this verdict. It is founded upon unimpeachable testimony, and the gods themselvs must say, "So mote it be."

Every tear of sorrow, every quivering nerve that feels the touch of pain, is an impeachment of this supposed ruler to whom millions pay the homage of fear. Every thrill of pain which passes under the eye of consciousness is an impeachment of heaven's high decree. Every felony, every form of evil, all misdeeds which hav made history criminal, confront him who rules, and he is held by every principle of justice known to man to be the criminal, and the only criminal, for all human transgressions come through his connivance. All-power, wisdom, and goodness cannot allow sin, wrong, harm, pain, sorrow, or accident to enter the portals of a universe where those attributes are enthroned. But the fact that all these things which are deplorable do exist in the life of our race is strong demonstrativ evidence that no such gods with such attributes lie behind the phenomena of the universe. All those who come with homage to the pseudo-sovereign whom they hav enthroned are but making offerings that are the gifts of ignorance and superstition.

"Infinit power, wisdom, and goodness" must withdraw from the universe in good order, or if they remain we hav the right to demand the withdrawal from this universe of all that is not in harmony with them. Hence there should be no more sorrow, no more harm, no more weeping, no more sin, no more evil; no poisonous vapors to inhale, no venomous reptils or bloody teeth; no more ills and sickness, pain and death; no more deadly cold or destructiv heat; no odors but those which create a sense of delight; no filth; no bitter or nauseating flavors; no violation of the highest artistic, cultivated taste; no abnormalities, no cripples, no monstrosities—no museums which torture the sense of the beautiful; no necessities forced upon a human structure which implies filth and sickening smells. There would be no impurities, naught which can offend the finest sense of fitness. The entire universe must be in perfect harmony; no discord anywhere. Such must be the condition of a universe ruled by infinit power, wisdom, and goodness. It may be said that this cannot be, we must hav contrast. This is the proverb of a world such as we liv in, but such a proverb could not exist in a universe ruled by the attributes named. If the Gods could not make a universe thus perfect, then they are not infinit in power, wisdom and goodness. No man or woman living is so bad that had that person infinit power, wisdom, and goodness he or she would not hav just such a world as I hav described, free from pain and sorrow, and full of joy. Put a mother, invested with these attributes—infinit power, wisdom, and goodness—upon the throne of the universe, and what a wonderful change would soon come across the life of all men, women, and children! Is it possible to imagin for a moment that she would people it with her children under conditions such as the gods hav made for their children? The universe controled by her would be like the one we hav set forth; free from pain, anguish, and sorrow; no broken hearts, no brains tortured into despair; no one dying for want of care, nor want of bread; no one cast out—followed by a flaming sword—upon whom vengeance is taken; no, none of these, but a universe full of joy and happiness. No one cast off, lost or forgotten, none so created that they would ever think or do a wrong. Happiness would fill all hearts and all that is sentient would feel the thrill of joy in the life and conditions which the mother gave; none would go astray, none would be lost, not one in need of redemption; no place for the crucifixion of an innocent being whom the gods had forsaken in the greatest extremity; no temptation, no possibility for such a deed; devils and hells could not find their way into a universe ruled by a mother having infinit power, wisdom, and goodness. But the student of nature released from the idea that behind nature infinit power, wisdom, and goodness lie, has no difficulty in solving the problem of life in the light of the revelations which nature has made of itself in our lives, with our joys and sorrows, for the very same reason that nature has neither virtue or vice; she has no ethical laws; has neither pain nor joy; in her evolution she has in her designless method evolved forms of matter with a sense of discrimination termed moral and immoral.

J. H. Burnham.

One of the most improbable tales in the Bible is the one wherein Samson is accused of catching five thousand foxes and tying their tails together with firebrands to burn up his neighbor's barley. If they moved at all when in that ridiculous position, one or the other would hav to be dragged backward. The story sounds fishy.

Observations.

Congressman Bourke Cochran, a nativ of Ireland and a representativ from New York, delivered a speech the other day at a Catholic school exhibition in this city. In the course of his remarks, which were mainly buncombe, he made this statement:

> The Catholic church is the oldest republic in the world. She is the mother of republics.

When I hear a remark like that from a legislator I always wonder if he is as dishonest in his official capacity as he is when not drawing his per diem; for you might as well say that a harem is a nunnery as to say that the Catholic church is a republic. It is not even a monarchy, nor a theocracy—it is a papacy, and its members hav no more to do with choosing their representativs than vagrom curs hav with the appointing of dog-catchers. The pope is the Gerry of that organization. As for the maternal relations of the church toward republics, they do not subsist except in the sense that necessity is the mother of invention, and the offspring is not legitimate. There are examples known to history where the church played mistress to the king, and the pollution of both was such that the people upset throne and altar at one effort, and republics arose over the ruins. In our sort of government the rulers are supposed to derive their powers from the governed, while the pope claims to get his authority from the holy ghost. It is true that in making this claim his holiness is talking through his mitre, but such is the theory of papal government. Bourke Cockran's notion of a republic was probably acquired from observation of the system prevailing in Tammany Hall, which is the political wing of the Roman Catholic church in New York.

Colonel Breckinridge continues to use the political stump as a confessional box, his apology for his conduct in the matter of Miss Pollard being somewhat less respectable than his original offense. In his contest for re-election from the Ashland district he is probably giving his hoped-for constituents more sacred history than they ever got from their clergymen, though according to last accounts he appears to hav exhausted the list of Breckinridges of holy writ, and has fallen back on examples from hynnology. The people are now by him reminded that "while the lamp holds out to burn, the vilest sinner may return," which is said to be good theology. If, however, he means to apply it in a Congressional sense, the voters would do well to adopt the colored preacher's suggestion and blow out the light. Politics is at present loaded with about all the religious hypocrisy the traffic will bear.

In his earnest effort to believe, at one and the same time, in both free expression and legal repression, Mohammed Charles Chilton Moore, the blue grass blasphemer, is experiencing the difficulty I predicted he would in finding the "congruvial" company which he seeks. As a Prohibitionist he has made common cause with the clergymen, but now one minister has instigated his arrest for blasphemy, while another publishes a card in the Lexington papers asking all Christian people to withdraw their support and their advertisments from his Blue Grass Blade. This makes Moore disgusted, and under that impulse, says he, "I go to speak to a class of people in Cincinnati who call themselvs Rationalists, and I am met by a fine audience of intelligent looking and handsomely dressed ladies and gentlemen. They seemed to be largely of the Atheistic school of Infidelity. They want me to say as much as possible against religion and little as possible for Prohibition, and I found the president of the society in a saloon, Sunday evening." This is all he says about Mr. Light. He does not tell us whether or not that gentleman extended the usual courtesies, or whether the Ohio vintage is equal to the Kentuky product. Neither does he explain how he happened to be in a saloon himself, but he leaves the impression that a person other than a Prohibitionist who will visit a hostelry on Sunday evening is not good people. But more trouble follows. Misfortune is gregarious. Moore wrote to Colonel Ingersoll, offering him his case for what there is in it, and the colonel replies that owing to prior arrangements it will be impossible for him to take the case; adding, "I guess you will not need much help." This shatters another of Moore's idols; and he will advise his friends not to patronize Colonel Ingersoll any more. Added to the rest, he is candidate for Congress on the Prohibition ticket, and must be conscious that if his cause is tried on its merits he has about as luminous a prospect of getting there as he has of going to the penitentiary.

In his oration on Voltaire, Victor Hugo relates the case of a young man named La Barre, who was put to torture and death because, "on a day after a night of storm and high wind, there was found upon the pavement of a bridge an old crucifix of worm-eaten wood, which for three centuries had been fastened to the parapet." It was proved that on the night in question La Barre had crossed the bridge. During the torture the young man's bones were broken, his executioners cut off one of his hands; they then tore out his tongue with iron pincers, and cut off his head and threw it in the fire. "Then," says Hugo, "then, O Voltaire! thou didst utter a cry of horror, and it will be thine eternal glory! Then didst thou enter upon the appaling trial of the past; thou didst plead, against tyrants and monsters, the cause of the human race, and thou didst gain it. Great man, blessed be thou forever!"

That was one hundred and thirty years ago. Could such a thing happen to-day? Not exactly, but something about as bad has just occurred in Russia, and we hav no Voltaire to utter a cry of horror.

Thirty-eight years ago, as related by the New York World, a Russian boy, Ivan Rykoff by name, while intoxicated, carried off the candles of a church —an offense which merited a sentence of "ten dollars or ten days." Rykoff was condemned to slavery in the Siberian mines. He escaped, returned to Russia, married, and raised a family. A few weeks ago he repeated to somebody the story of his youthful indiscretion and his escape. It got to the police, he was rearrested and has just been sent back to Siberia to serve out, under the knout, a sentence equal to life imprisonment. His judges hav not the mercy of the French inquisitors who cut off the head of La Barre. We can still shudder over the fate of that young man, but what hav we to say about the barbarities inflicted upon Rykoff? Officially, nothing; for the government of the United States has but recently completed an extradition treaty with Russia, under the terms of which, if Rykoff should escape and find refuge in this "asylum for mankind," all our legal, judicial, and executiv machinery must be set in motion to send him back to Siberia. Thus it appears that the government of the United States has entered into a league with the worst tyranny on earth to furnish human backs for the Cossack knout. It may be diplomacy, but I would like to see every official who voted for that treaty driven from office with the same instrument of punishment he has helped to apply to men like Rykoff.

Admitting the veracity of our eyesight, there are Freethinkers who believe in the initiativ and referendum so implicitly that they are not only anxious to surrender their liberties to it, but think it proper to boycott the minority who hold that in matters of opinion one is a majority. Just now it is desired by advocates of the above system to submit to a vote of the whole people the proposition to amend the Constitution by the recognition of God and Christ (instead of the aforesaid whole people) as the rulers of this nation; that is, they would consent to the use of the sovereign power they claim—the ballot—to decide that something else is sovereign instead of themselvs. Why Freethinkers should want to do this is unexplainable. They hav everything to lose and nothing to gain, for supposing the amendment were rejected they would only hav the Constitution as it is now. If it carried they would be disfranchised. Submitting that amendment to vote would be, in effect and in fact, putting up the Constitution against a worthless dogma, which is not an even bet. Secularists would be giving all the odds. The proposition is further out of order, for the reason that whatever rights may belong to the elector, the right to vote on the citizen's belief is not included among them.

The Freethinkers in the people's party can make themselvs very useful if they choose—not by voting on every whim the church desires to engraft upon the laws of the country, but by secularizing the platform of their party and electing Representativs and Senators accordingly. Thus far all their Representativs hav proved to be destitute of sound ideas about religious liberty, and a Senator has distinguished himself by introducing a Sunday bill. The Freethinking Populist may join the letter-writing corps and inform his representativs in Congress that he is ashamed of them.

I hav several correspondents who inform me in confidence that thay are not fully in sympathy with THE TRUTH SEEKER because they think the economic question is of more importance that the questions discussed in these columns, and they would like to see the paper devote itself to industrial emancipation. I am sometimes tempted to admit that, with government so corrupt, so expensiv, so incompetent, and so useless, any journal would be justified in giving some space to a discussion of how best to abolish it; but when I note that these correspondents hav not as yet agreed upon any method of reform, I am led to reflect upon what a hornets' nest would be stirred up if a Freethought paper should commit itself to any economic doctrin. But leaving that out, the only method of governmental reform worth advocating must be an extension of Freethought principles into statecraft. All the systems are branches of the parent stem, and none of them could get a start without it. Where each reformer makes his fatal error is in quitting the trunk as unimportant, crawling out on some chosen limb, and then sawing it off behind him in order to graft it. The result is that all the ground for yards around is covered with dead limbs, which the economic reformers tangle themselves up in or use as clubs for one another's heads. I hav a notion that if we properly guard, cultivate, and fertilize the tree, and do a little judicious pruning amongst the limbs and suckers, we can trust to the course of nature for the production of desirable fruit.

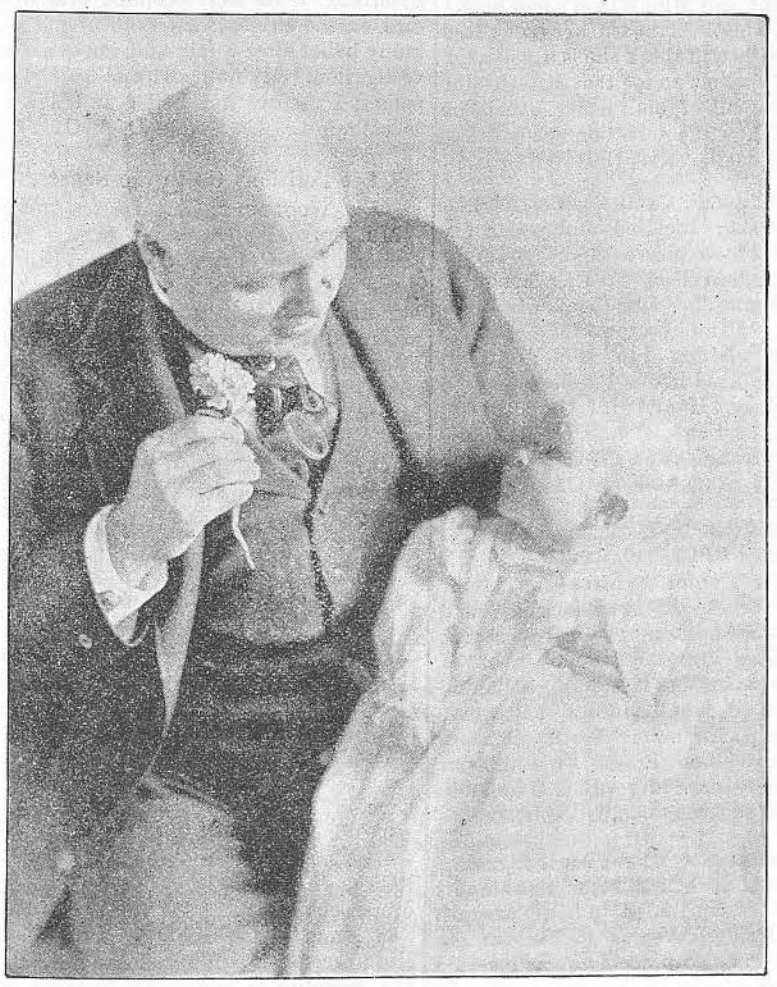
It is too awfully awful that the church cannot crush out of human nature all that is healthful, cheerful, and decent. But it cannot; even regular eaters of human flesh and drinkers of human blood cannot, in these days, be kept within the narrow limits of enjoyment prescribed by churchly authority. Ministers themselvs will sometimes go to a theater or ride on a Sunday train. Read this:

> "At a meeting of Methodist ministers of Milwaukee an attack made on the chureh disciplin was freely applauded by those present. The clergymen came to the conclusion that it would be utterly impossible to administer the letter of the church law. If they did they would be in a continual row with their congregations. They could not keep people away from theaters, circus performances, cards, Sunday trains, Sunday newspapers, and the like. Even ministers ride on Sunday trains. Some of the speakers thought it would be best not to catalog the sins, but to go back to the system that existed prior to 1872, when the church specified the sins without prohibiting them."—Daily Paper.

Just think of "church mauling" a man for reading a Sunday newspaper or riding out to the park on Sunday! No wonder that there are so many people who hav not become intellectual Freethinkers but yet hav only contempt for the church.

One of the most exhaustiv family genealogies extant is Mr. Darwin's "Descent of Man." While he has, perhaps, shown that our ancestors were hardly up to our standard, still he has made no "grass-before-sunlight" mistakes which will enable us to call in question his philosophy.

FREETHOUGHT—PAST, PRESENT, AND FUTURE.



Proem from "Four Hundred Years of Freethought."

GIORDANO BRUNO.

THE PAST—BRUNO.

Fair Bruno, looking forth with eyes of fire
Upon the world's broad scene; beyond the sun
Thy undimmmed glance seems to behold the stars,
Countless, and rushing through the endless space,
With opulence of life, as on earth's breast
Thyself a star from out the past didst burn,
Wakening the darkness with resplendent course
Athwart the centuries of gloom and fear;
Herald of morning, of the happy days,
With Freedom breathing in the peaceful skies;
With science in the kingly garb of toil,
The green earth paradised with loving hearts.
O brave immortal, glorious in the robe
Which burned thy body into fruitful dust,
They knew not, that wild horde about thy pyre,
Who knelt and trembled to a god of hate,
And crouched to earth—nor saw its wealth of life;
They knew not what was in thy dauntless gaze,
Outsweeping the rude throng and torturing heat—
The winged thoughts that all the despot's power
Could fetter not, nor blast with fiercest zeal.
They saw, that shuddering and relentless crowd,
The frail flesh sink in unconfining tomb,
And vainly triumphed o'er that murdered form.
For from that blackened spot went forth a word
Of wonder, joy, and beauty to all time,
And millions greet its power and hope unscathed.
O martyred Bruno, Science' fearless path,
Through regions numberless of earth and sky,
Makes laurels for thee, and man's brightest days
Flow from the moment of thy bitter death.
In thee the past turns from its darkened course,
Bursts from the gyves of ignorance and fear,
Smites down the tyrant from his bloody throne;
And as the earth wheels round the golden sun,
And as the sun speeds through unmeasured realms,
So doth the mind of man, unmeasured, vast,
From thy red dawn of death move radiant on,
In paths of glory broadening to the noon.

THE PRESENT—INGERSOLL.

And now the present answers to the past,
Genius to genius through the wondrous years;
Bruno and Ingersoll, and on Time's arch
What shining names adorn the pregnant space
From Nolan's silent ashes to the lips
That drop the sweetest words that charm the ear—
The eloquence that ceases not with speech,
But is immortal music to the mind!

Beloved master of the art supreme
To language forth the spirit world within;
To make words flow with new melodious grace,
Like waves that beaming break on shores of sense;
From the vast ocean of unbodied thought
Thy brain hath caught all feeling, all the light
Of imageries that fill the poet's eye;
The subtlest thoughts of man; the dim desires
That warm the savage breast; the dreams that haunt
And thrill and glorify the toiler's task,
Till beauty springs from labor as the sheen
Of lily from the sunless water spreads;
Thou readest the past, not as the bookworm reads,
With words and facts strung on a leaden thread,
But with imagination's golden power,
So that the finest effluence of its life,
Its heroes, martyrs, songs, philosophies,
Resurgent in the living present breathe,
Translated in thy miracle of speech
To heavens of thought, enriching life to-day.
Thus past and present in one glory join
To make the marvel of our future hope;
From Bruno's stake to Voltaire's radiant star,
To Paine's clear luster in the storms of war,
To grace and charm of him who gems this hour
With reason wedded to the poet's strain.
What light has gathered on man's toilsome way,
What joy and promise as new births bloom on!

THE FUTURE—THE CHILD.

O babe so beautiful, love's gracious gift;
The sweetest jewel of our mortal life,
The happy dawn upon our sorrows' path,
The only tyrant that our hearts enthrone,
The only monarch we obey and bless!
O heir of ages, and the future's glass
In which we see the splendors yet to be:
The tiny prophet of untraveled years;
The royal messenger of new domains
Embosomed in the unborn wealth of time,
To-morrow's king, sceptered in weakness dear,
We bring to thee the treasures of the past;
Thou bring'st to us a thousand treasures more.
For all the boundless future is thy realm,
Thine eyes are gates into the deeps of time,
Far shining in their clear and wondering gaze;
In thee are all the imprints of the past—
The million years of man's evolving life,
A thousand generations toiled for thee.
Poets hav sung and nations hav marched on;
Heroes hav died, and martyrs starred the heavens;
The lone discoverer hath watched the night,
Or toiled across the ocean's heaving breast,
Or pierced the chambers of the sea and land.
To make more splendid thy delightful hour—
To make thy birth the richest of all time.
In thee the past and present find their goal,
The fountain of the hope which jewels life.
Oh, what were life without thy helpless grace,
The soft entreaty of thy smiles and tears,
The beauty exquisit of dainty flesh
Flushed with the rose tints of thy joyous pulse?
O crown of all our toils and all our gains,
Bear on the song of life to future years.
Oh, take the blessing of the mighty past;
Oh, take the love, the glory of to-day,
Whose face is o'er thee tender as thy look,
Which holds the flower of promis o'er thy brow.
Grow strong and beautiful and brave and free,
Fair child, inheritor of sweet renown;
Make thy bright harvest in the fields of time;
Enrich with reason's light thy mingling path
With those which front with thine the golden dawn.
The great hereafter in thy beams we hail!

IT is not very often that the Brooklyn Philosophical Association has the opportunity, as it had last Sunday afternoon, of listening to a clergyman denouncing religion of every kind and preaching doctrins that are, to the Materialist, the hight of absurdity. Rev. F. E. Mason spoke on "The Science of Life." He said that any religion that demands faith and tries to subordinate the mind is the offspring of imbecility. He thought trouble, sickness, and death unnecessary if men would only rise above the physical and be the controlers of their minds, and that everything there is exists only through the mind. The mind is the cause of everything. "I exist through my mind, and I know you exist because I exist, but as soon as I do not exist you do not exist." This is the sum total of his philosophy. The audience appreciated such a change of intellectual diet.

HERE is a coincidence. Last Friday night, at the Manhattan Liberal Club, Dr. Isaac Hull Platt lectured on "Walt Whitman, the Prophet of Democracy." During the time the lecturer spoke on the frank, honest, rebellious, and lovable poet, the elements were exhibiting the same rebellious attitude toward fine weather that Walt Whitman did toward established customs and effete literary and social laws. It thundered and lightened and rained during the whole lecture, revealing in nature's symbolry the refreshing and purifying attributes of Walt Whitman. The lecture was very able and delivered in a pleasing manner. He showed that he was the prophet of democracy, and like all other true and sincere reformers had been misrepresented and maligned by the opponents of reform, who could glibly denounce, but who never read Whitman's works and never understood the philosophy that he so eloquently voiced to the world. Despite the inclemency of the weather, the hall was well filled, a tribute to the great old democratic poet, who sang of that grand, all-embracing charity, "the love of comrades." In the debate following the lecture nearly all the speeches were unqualifiedly laudatory of the noble author of "Songs of the Open Road."

According to THE TRUTH SEEKER, the devil has just presented his bill to the church, and has been referred to "Jesus who paid it all." As Jesus has been dead, from all accounts, nearly nineteen hundred years, his ability to "pay it all" is much in question; and, so far as I see, the only recourse left his sooty highness is to enter suit in some district court and bring the church to taw. Considering the invaluable service he has rendered the church, that organization's attempt to beat him out of his hard-earned wages is a piece of contemptible meanness, but in full keeping with its past history. —Cooperative Commonwealth.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 for "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." I hav had you send me so many books lately that you doubtless think me a Vanderbilt or Astor, but such is not quite the case. I am an ordinary laboring man on a small salary, but I find no trouble in raising a dollar or two now and then to purchase the right kind of reading matter. I would like very much to hav this reach you before Mr. Putnam's book goes to press. Yours truly, JOHN MCARDLE.

We hav some young Freethinkers in my neighborhood who ought to take the paper, but they complain of hard times and scarcity of money. I shall try again.
Yours truly, JNO. H. HARP.

CALVERT, TEX., May 11, 1894.
MR. EDITOR: I inclose $6.50 to renew my subscription and obtain "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." I am an old-timer, having landed on this planet in 1825. Hav been an individual, independent truth seeker for nearly sixty years; commenced investigating when very young by reading the historical part of the Bible, Gibbon's Rome, Rollin's ancient history, and other works, and hav been a Freethinker in every sense of the word ever since. My mother was a Presbyterian. I am well supplied with literture on the subject; am faithful and true to my belief after a fair and impartial investigation. My noble wife is an Episcopalian; I respect her belief and she respects mine. D. A. ORVISS.

Let Petitions Go to the Senate.

WOODBURY, GA., April 29, 1894.
MR. EDITOR: I see notice in the Independent Pulpit that another effort is being made to secure a religious amendment to our national Constitution, and that you are making a splendid fight against this attempted infamy. If you will send me some blanks I will circulate petitions against it. I hope that all the Liberals will hav the opportunity of signing petitions against it and going up to the polls in 1896 and voting for R. G. Ingersoll for president of the United States.

Some We Can Answer.

BUTTE, MONT., May 7, 1894.
MR. EDITOR: Will you kindly answer the following questions through your valuable paper:

1. What year and where did MRS. A. Lincoln die?
2. What is the belief of Robert T. Lincoln?
3. What was the belief of J. R. Lowell?
4. Whereabout in the Bible can I find the keeping of the seventh year as a period of rest commanded?
5. Much of the Bible is contradictory and obscene; if language means anything the meaning is clear. In arguing with Christians concerning these portions, they invariably giv the stereotyped answer: "The Bible is inspired and we don't understand it." Will you giv me an effectiv reply to same?

A Freethought lecturer is much needed in this city. ENOS A. MILLS.

[1. She is still living, we believe.
2. We do not know.
3. He was a Unitarian.
4. Lev. xxv, 2-7.
5. If the Bible is inspired and thus made so we are unable to understand it, will God, who so inspired it that we cannot understand it, damn us for not understanding that which he purposely fixed so we could not comprehend it? Or, what is a revelation worth that does not reveal?—ED. T. S.]

Another Earnest Helper.

SAN PEDRO, CAL., May 9, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Regarding the article in THE TRUTH SEEKER in reference to a "Letter-writing Corps," it meets my approval. Already I hav written to Senator Kyle, and hope the letters he is constantly getting, together with those received by the other Senators, will hav sufficient influence to turn the tide.

Mortuary—Patrick Cody.

SEMBRA, ONT., CAN., May 5, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: The funeral of Patrick Cody, a Freethinker of Sembra, Ont., was attended by J. H. Burnham, who spoke to a large audience in defense of this man who had broken allegiance with the Catholic church, and had found in a system of rational thinking the pleasures of freedom in a consciousness of relief from the religious dogmas and superstitions of the old church. He had won by his consistent conduct the good opinions of those who knew him, and who respected his honest judgment and consequent freedom from hypocrisy—an intelligent, honest man. This is enough—of vastly greater value than the emblems of the cross and consecrated mummeries driveling through the lips of an ignorant and long since antiquated priesthood. At the grave very appropriate words were said by a life-long Freethinker, Capt. Charles Gale, who had promised this dear dead that he would see that he was left to repose in silence while he was lovingly held in memory. "Farewell, Cody," fell from his lips, while tears testified to the deep emotion. It was painful, indeed, to part with him who had won the confidence of all those who had honest convictions.

A FRIEND.

Western Notes.

ATCHISON, KAN., April 29, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: At the funeral of a little girl at Marceline, Mo., recently, Colonel Ingersoll's oration at a child's grave was read.

Frank Oliphant, of Atchison, is making rapid progress as a Freethought writer of ability.

Professor Kilgore, a revivalist singer of Missouri, is described as a "converted pugilist."

Col. J. B. White, of Grandin, Mo., having aided the people in building two churches at that place, is now being urged to build a court house and a calaboose.

John R. Charlesworth, the young Freethought orator, has been in Kansas two months pouring his words of eloquence and unanswerable arguments into the orthodox ranks. If we had a Charlesworth in each county in the state Christianity would hav to be pitied. She is beginning to "snivel" as it is.

The daughter of Rev. John Knox, of Topeka, is in New York studying to go on the stage with her parents' full consent and approbation. We remember when ministers' children had to run off to go to a circus.—Atchison Globe.

Rev. Mr. Rentz, pastor of the Lutheran church at Atchison, recently preached a sermon on dancing which was so "awful" that several members hav left the church.

A reporter heard a man kicking the other day because a certain merchant allows ten per cent off to clergymen and makes it up on the workingman. If he will put his foot under all of them and kick them out of the world we will buy him things enough to last him a year.

A blind man arrived in a Kansas town recently and with a tin cup in his hand began singing religious hymns, which kept his kept his cup empty and caused people to avoid hearing his voice; but when he commenced singing "After the Ball" his cup was soon filled. He hasn't sung any more hymns.

With kind regards for the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, I remain as ever,

A Freethought lad,

Among Them but Not of Them.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., April 16, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I would like to get you some new subscribers, but people in this priest-cursed place won't look at such things. But if they won't I will and retail it out to them. If they won't read, they must hear. The building I liv in is full of Christ's followers; Young Men's Christian Association under me, Young Men's Christian Association school on one side, and missionary factory on the other side, and I hear the prayers of the saints ascending day and night. They hav been having things their own way, but I am after them. I am not working for the master, but for mental freedom. I hav been trying to get hold of some leaflets suitable for distribution. Pamphlets cost too much and will be thrown away without reading. I want discussion promoters and thought provokers, good to hand out or put in letters. Christians hav them, "Where will You Spend Eternity?" etc. I hav finally had some printed and if any one wants them I can furnish them cheap, say 25 cents per 100, or 500, assorted, $1.

I wish you could furnish Heston's cartoons, some that I could select, for about 50 cents per hundred. I would paste them up around. By the way, when are you going to publish Vol. II. of the "Pictorial Text-Book?" I hav read "Researches in Oriental History." It givs startling evidence concerning the Jews and the Bible.

In a tract by H. L. Hastings is the confession of Joseph Barker, in which he says he has "trod the dreadful path from beginning to end. It is a weary and dismal road, and it leads to wretchedness and ruin, that Infidelity is madness, and the religion of Christ is the perfection of wisdom and goodness." Dr. Buckley, also, in his argument with Ingersoll relates that Mr. Barker renounced Infidelity some time before his death, "and devoted the remainder of his life to undoing the evil he had done." He also givs his dying testimony and the names of witnesses. I realize that his recantation is no evidence in proof of Christianity, but I want to know if is true as stated, and what are the facts.

Send me one dozen Holyoake's "Secular Prayer," and one dozen "Our Father in Heaven."

E. TUTTLE.

[The story of Joseph Barker, as we got it from one who knew him, is, briefly, this: He grew old, was poor and feeble. The Christians got hold of him, fed him, housed him, clothed him, and in return he recanted. This occurred in or around St. Louis, we believe. But the poor old man could never overthrow his own argument, and rarely tried to, but talked rather of the goodness of Christians than of the "truths of Christianity." He talked for his board and clothes, and paid a terrible price for them.—ED. T. S.]

Two Peculiar Subscribers.

NEW ERA, OR., May 8, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I see my time has expired for your paper. I do not wish to take it any more. I see by your editorial that you are not in favor of letting the God-in-the-Constitution amendment come before the people, and that is conclusiv evidence that you are not in favor of a republic. I am in favor of a republic; I am in favor of everything that is of interest to the people coming before the people. It seems to me that going to Washington and printing those tracts is a scheme for a job for some one whose salary will be paid out of Freethinkers' subscriptions. I am an Infidel, and always was, but not the kind to be hoodwinked out of money for such useless things as that. Let every Freethinker giv the money he has to spare to the sick and needy in the vicinity in which he livs and he will help the cause tenfold, for there is the place to work, and its success lies with them doing the right thing in the neighborhood in which they liv.

Mr. H. M. Baggess says to stop his paper for the same reasons.

[Our parting friend's reasoning is the very very queerest reasoning that we remember ever to hav read. According to his logic, if the Christians try to pass a law to burn all Freethinkers we must not oppose its enactment, but simply ask whether a majority favor it, and if so, then we must not oppose its execution, but bring fagots to start the fire! And all because the majority want it!

No, Messrs. Stone and Baggess, it is because we are in favor of a republic that we oppose the church's attempt to make our government a theocracy. But if all the people reasoned as you do, the church would hav an easy victory, and you would hav a pretty hard time living in such a republic. You wouldn't be visiting many sick people, for your Christian jailers wouldn't let you out very often.

And why shouldn't a man be paid for opposing the church's attempts to establish a theocracy—supposing they are to be opposed at all? He isn't doing it for himself, but for all the people, and particularly for Freethinkers, who would be the first to feel the tyranny of the church. He works for their benefit, and while doing it cannot liv on air, nor travel on free passes, like the preachers. And why shouldn't the publisher of the tracts be paid? He has to pay the compositors, the electrotypers, the paper manufacturer, the pressman, the binder, the clerks who do the mailing, and the government for carrying the tracts. He likewise has to pay rent, and occasionally hav something to eat. Messrs. Stone and Baggess's vision of a "scheme" is just about as queer as their logic.

We hope, however, they will attend to the visitation of the sick as faithfully as we shall attend to thwarting every scheme their friends the Christians concoct to make this country a theocracy. If they do, the invalids and needy of their neighborhood will hav an easier time.—ED. T. S.]

Others Than Maine Farmers Should Help Him.

VINELAND, N. J., May 8, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Will you hav the kindness to publish the following and help a poor old man who has spent his life in the Liberal cause and is now in extreme want, without house or home of his own or the means to purchase one? In 1845, after boldly lecturing twenty years against priestcraft and church-craft, I met the first Liberal—then called Infidel—that I ever conversed with. He gave me $5 at the close of one of my lectures. With that and $5 more, for which I pledged my overcoat, I started my paper, the Portland Pleasure Boat. Got one thousand copies printed, and got the printer to keep the form up till I sold them, and then had another thousand of the same number printed. It was something new, and took well with the common people who were beginning to think. After they read it they sent it to distant friends, and in that way it soon gained a circulation in nearly every state in the Union, and with that small beginning I published the paper sixteen years, and sent it at least one year to every man, woman, or child that asked for it, whether they paid or not.

Maine at that time had whole counties of wild land that it was selling in large tracts to shylocks, while hundreds of men had not an acre, and I saw hundreds more who had got in debt when young, to redeem their natural birthright to land, and worked till they were fifty, sixty, or seventy years of age before they got it paid for—selling the best of everything they raised and living on the poorest. I had the idea that every man when twenty-one had a natural birthright to land enough to make a home and raise his food on without paying any man or government for it. I took hold of that subject in my paper, wrote letters to the governor and members of the legislature, and the result was, a law was passed to giv every landless man in Maine who would settle on it one hundred and sixty acres of that wild land for only fifty cents an acre; no money, but all to be paid in labor, making their own roads, the same as free. Now read the Portland Transcript, the best paper in Maine, and learn of the hundreds of carloads of products leaving Houlton, on their new railroad, where the country was then a wilderness.

Now, if I liv till the 16th of this month, May, I shall pass my ninety-third birthday, and now what I want is for every man that received one hundred and sixty acres of that land to make me a birthday present sufficient in all to buy me a cottage for a comfortable home of my own the remainder of my days; and I think they can well afford to do it. These facts are all recorded in the bound volume of my Pleasure Boat, here in my desk, and in doing this work I had not a word of help from any other paper.

The people here in Vineland receive one hundred barrels of early rose potatoes at a time from that new country. I hav within the last seventy years received two barrels of letters from people thanking me because my lectures and paper brought them out of the churches and gave them something better, but hav never received a letter nor a word of thanks from anyone that settled on the land that I got free to them.

Laws Which Priest-Politicians Love.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 12, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Your editorial on "Present Day Infamies," in this week's TRUTH SEEKER, suggests to me that you might with profit use the inclosed extract from the "Blue Laws" of Maryland—never repealed, and in force in this District.

The last paragraph of your editorial reminded me of this extract. You may use it, probably, as showing the progress made by the enlightenment of mankind, despite the damnable clogging of the wheels by religious bigotry and priestcraft. We may well feel thankful that we do not liv in the times when such legislation was possible. Thanks to the Infidels of the past for the betterment of the world. Let us take courage, and hammer away till the last vestige of the infernalism of religion is banished from the statutes and from the hearts of the people as well. But we must watch the dying devils—in their struggles to exist they may still be powerful to sting. Vide the "Sunday Rest" mischief here in the District. Vigilance is the price of religious as well as civil liberty.

Hopefully, your co-worker,

A. J. BOYER.

The following is from the Washington Star:

If the old laws inherited by the District from Maryland could be enforced Carl Browne "the reincarnation of Christ," as he styles himself, and leader of the army of the commonweal, might be in danger of having his tongue perforated. One of these old blue laws of Maryland, still standing unrepealed upon the statute books of the District, passed on the 26th of October, 1723, by the province of Maryland, is as follows:

"Be it enacted by the right honorable the lord proprietor, by and with the advice and consent of his lordship's governor and the upper and lower houses of assembly, and the authority of the same, that if any person shall hereafter within this province, wittingly, maliciously, and advisedly, by writing or speaking, blaspheme or curse God or deny our Savior Jesus Christ to be the Son of God, or shall deny the Holy Trinity, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, or the Godhead of any of the three persons, or the unity of the Godhead, or shall utter any profane words concerning the Holy Trinity or any of the persons thereof, and shall be thereof convicted by verdict or by confession, shall for the first offense be bored through the tongue and fined twenty pounds sterling, to the lord proprietor to be applied to the use of the county where the offense shall be committed, to be levied on the offender's body, goods, etc., and in case the said fine can not be levied the offender to suffer six months' imprisonment without bail or mainprise; and that for the second offense, the offender being thereof convicted as aforesaid, shall be punished by burning in the forehead with the letter B and fined forty pounds sterling to the lord proprietor, and in case the same cannot be levied the offender shall suffer twelve months' imprisonment without bail or mainprise; and that for the third offense, being convicted as aforesaid, shall suffer death without the benefit of the clergy."

This law was referred to by Mr. S. F. Phillips, acting attorney general of the United States, in a letter written on the 30th of June, 1877, to the District Commissioners in relation to the legality of contracts made after advertising in Sunday papers. This controversy, which refers to the condition of the Sunday laws of the District, has been unearthed by Mr. McKenny, clerk of the United States Supreme Court. In this letter Mr. Phillips gave it as his opinion that the statute of October, 1723, which has just been quoted, was then in force in the District, and there has been no enactment since the date of his letter to change this condition. The offense for which Mr. Browne might be tried under this law would be that of blasphemy, in that he has claimed to be the reincarnation of the Savior ever since the commonweal movement was inaugurated at Massillon. Of course, Mr. Browne's defense against the enforcement of this law, which as Mr. Phillips stated, is antiquated and obsolete in many of its provisions, might be based upon the provision of the Constitution against "cruel and unusual punishments."

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"...en the dark and the daylight,
...en the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Old Bill.

He never was much of a beauty,
He was scraggy, and raw-boned and tall,
But his faithful attention to duty
Endeared the old horse to us all,

Twenty years had he served us with vigor,
Till his youth and activity passed;
Then we daily relaxed duty's vigor—
And decided to sell him at last!

Yes, we bade him good-bye and we sold him
To a huckster who fancied his ways,
Who promised with kindness to hold him
In ease till the end of his days!

One day, as he wended at leisure
Along, with his cart-lord of truck,
The alarm by Officer Frazier
At a neigboring corner was struck.

Stock still stood the veteran charger,
And strained he his eye-balls half blind;
He seemed to swell out and grow larger
As old memories surged in his mind.

He stood till once more it sounded,
One, two, three, four, five hasty peals,
Then away like a rocket he bounded,
With the cart clattering hard at his heels.

Away flew potatoes and onions,
In vain did the huckster cry "whoa!"
Where duty called loudest for action
Old Bill was determined to go.

Straight up to the first plug he came to
He made, did Old Bill, bless his heart!
And backed, without sign of assistance,
To its nozzle the old empty cart!

Then we gave him three cheers, and we kissed him,
And then and there roundly we swore
That back to the service that missed him
He should go, and should quit it no more!

So we bought him straight back from his master,
And he draws number ninety-eight still.
We wouldn't take thousands of dollars
To-day for our faithful Old Bill.

—LETITIA VIRGINIA DOUGLAS, Progressive Age.

One of the most enjoyable visits was the trip to Mount Hamilton. We went by coach, a merry party of thirteen, the presence of the driver relieving the unpleasantness of the ominous number to the superstitious. The distance from San Jose to the mountain is, as the crow flies, only 13 miles, but the winding, zigzag road, costing $75,000 to build, makes the drive 26 good long miles—52 there and back. To the Lick Observatory at the top of the mountain is 4,200 feet, and San Jose is 80 feet above sea level. The road we traversed is a wonderful piece of engineering skill and there are 367 turns in it.

It was high noon when we left town, and the ride is through the lovely Santa Clara valley, one of the most charming in this fair paradise of America. The undulating surface is a constant delight, covered as it is for miles with immense fruit orchards, flower and vegetable gardens. The great, green, grassy slopes, stretching far and wide, were like webs of softest silken plush. Nature and industry hav made the Santa Clara a veritable modern Eden, through which we rode under the sapphire skies in the warm golden sunlight of April. From the foothills on, up the mountain steep, the scenic views are most romantic and enchanting. Glens, deep ravines, sharp clefts, lofty peaks, and shaded dells are on either side, while in the background are the solemn yet most picturesque and serene Gavilan, Santa Cruz, and Sierra Morena ranges. Up and down we went by the curious, crooked road and down again into Hall's Valley, and then away up, and up again, around Cape Horn, and from there, deep down, into a canyon, the great dome of the observatory seeming now near and then far off, like the fabled pot of gold at the end of the rainbow.

Half way we stopped to change horses. The road was very dusty from this place on. When within six or seven miles of our destination the very obliging driver indicated that we might, for a change, walk over one of the hills and descend to a point where we could intercept the coach after its winding detour. About half the company sprang lightly from the carriage and began the ascent in high glee, Miss Massachusetts, as the Editor of the Corner was called, among the number. It had seemed only a slight elevation viewed from the carriage, but, oh, what a deception!

Jest and repartee soon changed to solemnity and finally a dogged silence, as we trudged up the steep incline, the altitude affecting some quite painfully. We gathered lovely wild flowers along the way, but it was a wearied, toil-worn group that reached the top of the "little hill" at last, and upon which Miss Chisholm, of Iowa, snapped her kodak. I assure you it did not take long to descend the hill and meet the coach, with its grinning driver and the cool, collected occupants upon the seats they had not left. "And did you enjoy the walk?" they questioned. Not one of us would confess that we did not, and we were most enthusiastic in our praises of the scenery and exhilarating exercise, although each of us felt we were half dead from the unwonted tramp. Mephistopheles up there on the box grinned more than ever and said, "G'lang there," to his four-in-hand in a most sarcastic and irritating manner. About 6 P.M. we reached the summit of Mount Hamilton, where was obtained a most comprehensiv view of the San Joaquin valley, away off to the Sierras—fully one hundred and fifty miles distant; and to the northward, as well as to the south, we looked over the misty blue canyons of the coast mountains and across the valleys to the majestic Pacific ocean, a grand and inspiring sight.

Then we had lunch there on the mountain top, after which we inspected the observatory, and "Miss Massachusetts" was accorded an interview with Professor Holden, who is president of the University of California as well as director of the observatory.

The Lick Observatory with all its paraphernalia cost about a million dollars. The great dome has a diameter of seventy-five feet, and its weight, without the floor, is more than a hundred tons. The lens of the splendid instrument is thirty-six inches in diameter and the tube is a monster to look at, fifty-six feet long, yet is easily manipulated by a gentle movement of the hand.

The public can look through the wonderful instrument only on Saturday evenings, and there were over two hundred ladies and gentlemen seated in the balcony that evening, where

On yon peak, against the cloudless sky,
The guarding eye of science reads the deep.

It was a weird but most enchanting experience when the wondrous conoid of the dome was gently set in motion to adjust the big telescope. Lanterns here and there relieved the darkness, but the figures flitting back and forth seemed more like specters than human beings, and when the elevating floor began to slowly sink or rise, according to direction, the experience was strangely novel and required little imagination to fancy that we might, then and there, go sailing through space on an aërial voyage.

Finally, it came my turn to look at the "bright silver moon" through the telescope. About a hundredth part of the moon's surface was shown, and it was truly a marvelous sight. A photograph of the scene was taken by flashlight.

The crater of Copernicus was plainly visible, with little peaks within. Part of the crater upon which the sun was shining was light and glistening, while other portions were dark. Long ranges of mountains were distinctly visible, all covered with snow. We afterward looked through the twelve-inch telescope in another part of the building and observed the planet Saturn, its rings, and some of its moons.

James Lick, the founder of the observatory, as you know, was a radical Freethinker. He left all his millions for useful, scientific, and educational purposes. His body rests at the base of the dome, the most illustrious and grandest mausoleum in the world. It was not by his request, however. When dying he was asked where he would like to be buried. He replied that it did not matter where—he did not care; but his friends thought it quite in keeping to place his remains there, that this achievement of star-eyed science should be his monument forever. In the reception room is a fine portrait in oil of the renowned Freethinker; also the work-bench which was the beginning of his great fortune. A silver plate upon it bears this inscription: "This work-bench was brought from S. America to San Francisco in 1847 by James Lick. The foundation of his large fortune, and the source of his power to confer great and lasting benefits upon his fellow-citizens and upon mankind, was honest and faithful labor."

And it is honest and faithful labor that accomplishes all that is of value to humanity from a material point of view—a fact we should all remember.

At 10 P.M. we started back on our journey to San Jose, and, as the descent was much easier (the downward grade always is) than the ascent, it was accomplished in much less time. Some story-telling gentlemen in the party, with vivid imaginations, beguiled the hours by telling tales of outlaws and bandits who, they said, formerly inhabited the mountains roundabout and were accustomed to hold up coaches and belated travelers.

As the coach wound in and out, amid precipitous peaks, we found ourselvs peering down into the shadowy ravines, almost expecting to see a robber leap from behind the bending branches of the trees. Ghost, goblin, and witch stories were next in order, and it was most easy to think such might hold carnival among the ridges and valleys of the hills. But neither ghost, hobgoblin, witch, wizard, or bandit did we meet, and so we rode in the moonlight amidst the changing shadows of mountain tops and lowly vales wrapped in the somber mantle of midnight.

We reached San Jose just after 2 A.M. very tired and very sleepy, but highly pleased with our most interesting and instructiv visit to Mount Hamilton observatory.

San Jose is an attractiv and picturesque city, and I was not unmindful, while sojourning there, of some friends and children belonging to our Corner, but I knew not where to find them, and they, of course, did not know I was for a brief period among them. S. H. W.

The Midwinter Fair.

After seeing the great World's Fair at Chicago, the Midwinter Fair in San Francisco has not great charms; still it is a fine state exhibition. It is beautifully located in the Golden Gate Park facing the great Pacific ocean, and the park contains a thousand acres, about one hundred and sixty being devoted to the Fair. There are five main structures surrounding a parallelogram, where there are playing fountains, some statuary, and beautiful flowering plants and trees of various kinds. This Fair has no Ferris wheel, but it has an electric tower, which is two hundred and fifty feet in hight. From the top a fine view of San Francisco bay can be had on the north and south, also the "Golden Gateway," and on the western side can be seen the majestic waves of the ocean beating upon the beach, while the mountains loom in the distance.

The display of the productions of California is splendid, particularly the fruit, vegetables, nuts, and various kinds of ores; Fresno county bearing off the palm for fruit. Southern California shipped last year eight thousand car loads of oranges.

Many different ores are exhibited, and among the novelties is a gold mine, showing every phase of gold mining. There is shown borax in its nativ state, also borax refined, from San Bernardino. A banana tree, in bud, and another bearing fruit, made a handsome spectacle. A pyramid composed of corn seemed very imposing, and a very pretty pagoda formed of beans of different sizes and colors was so arranged as to appear like mosaic work.

There was a life-size elephant made of walnuts, a horse and rider of prunes, and many curiosities in the arrangement of fruit whose fragrance made the air so heavy as to almost produce faintness. There is a midway plaisance, too, in this Fair, and a street in Cairo, and, upon the whole, the Fair is a pretty good imitation of the Chicago Exposition, but it comes too soon after that wonderful exhibition to create much enthusiasm, except to Californians. The same Turkish and other merchants are here, but they appear tired out and wearied, and would no doubt be glad to get back to their nativ land once more.

SAN FRANCISCO KINDERGARTENS.

One day I went out to the Silver street Kindergarten. This is the California Kindergarten Training School, and is a very interesting place. It is, I believe, the first of its kind established on the coast. About two hundred children were in attendance, gathered in from the poorest of San Francisco's varied population. The children seemed very happy, and some of them are perhaps treated kinder there than anywhere else. I was shown the chair and desk of little Patsey, whose pathetic story Mrs. Wiggin has told so well, and was introduced to several little waifs whose history would be, if told, quite as interesting as Patsey's. Among the children was one little boy, who persisted in coming to school so very dirty that he was sent home by the teacher. His mother beat him, and sent him back unwashed and uncombed. In explanation she said: "Well, I hav ten children, two deaf and dumb, and the last two are twins. What can I do, with only one pair of hands?" Sure enough. What could she do? Poor mother! What a pity that ignorance and folly prevail in the homes as well as anywhere!

Then I visited another Kindergarten, where fortune's more favored children were gathered, and the better condition, the superior home and higher training, was visible upon the countenances of the bright-eyed little pupils.

THE CLIFF HOUSE AND SEAL ROCKS.

A pretty drive through handsome streets, past lovely homes where roses are blooming on bushes six and eight feet high; where, under the shadow of graceful palms, white and yellow marguerites lift their heads toward the sun; where there are great beds and thick rows of stately calla lilies, pink and white daisies and clambering nasturtiums, brings one at last to the edge of the great Pacific ocean. The wonderful waves leap and dash around the famous seal rocks, where many seals lay sporting and basking in the golden sunshine. One mother tossed a baby seal into the water, and watched it try to swim. Again and again she threw the little one from the rock, watching its maneuvers with almost human eagerness, as it strove to get back to its mamma again. The tide was out, and I walked the beach until it came, with great, wide reaches, singing a proud surf song, dancing away up on the sandy shore. I tried to find some shells for souvenirs, but the sea refused to leave them near the Cliff House where we were, and a lad, named Charley Sleeper, who livs in San Francisco, ran along the shore a good half mile, until he found one for me. Off to the right I could see the picturesque passage called the "Golden Gate," through whose portals must pass all ships as they come in from sea. From the deep, white-capped billows, splashing and crashing against the rocks, I turned reluctantly away. The sea makes always a lovely picture—it is so grand and defiant—so natural and magnificent, so beyond all imitation, enchanting, magnetic, and majestic. It is only a short distance from the Cliff House to the garden paradise on Sutro Hights, where all is fair as glossy foliage, bright-hued blooms, shaded walks, all kinds of shrubs, palms of various sorts, relieved every few steps by graceful forms in marble, can make the scene. The gardens are open to the public all days, and there are no flaming swords turning all ways to keep anybody out of this modern Eden. It is great to be a money king, and greater still to use money like a—man. S. H. W.

Just Out.—25 Cents.—Five Copies for $1.

A Liberal living in Michigan said once that he would give $25 a year to have the Crimes of Preachers recorded, as the frequent lapses of virtue of the ministers showed how little value Christianity possesses to make men moral.

We have just issued the Fourth Edition of the book doing this. The additions for this new edition of the

"Crimes of Preachers"

shows nearly 400 cases of ministerial conduct. While those in previous editions show that within a few years about

of one kind or another of criminal conduct. Most of the crimes are against women, for the fair sex are at once the weakness and the strength of the church—"the church" meaning of course the clergy.

Notwithstanding the many additional pages, we have kept the price the same, 25 cents. Send for a copy, and confound the churchmen. Show them just what sort of scamps are the clergy who have closed the World's Fair on Sunday, because it is so holy a day that to look upon machinery or paintings in this period is "immoral."

CTION IN PRICE OF A GREAT BOOK.

With the eighth edition of Winwood Reade's "Martyrdom of Man," the cost of production has been lessened so that we can reduce the price from $1.75 to $1.00.

The book has had a phenomenal sale for so heretical a work, second only to Helen Gardener's "Men, Women, and Gods," and we give our readers the pecuniary benefit of it. The

is a very interestingly pictured synopsis of universal history, showing what the race has undergone—its martyrdom—in its rise to its present plane. It shows how War and Religion have been oppressive factors in man's struggle for Liberty, and the last chapter, of some 150 pages, describes his intellectual struggle from the animal period of the earth to the present, adding an outline of what the author conceives would be a religion of reason and love. The chapters are:

WAR. Egypt, Western Asia, the Persians, the Greeks, the Macedonians, Alexandria, the Phenicians, Carthage and Rome, Roman Africa, the Arabs.

RELIGION. The Natural History of Religion, the Israelites, the Jews, the Prophets, Character of Jesus, the Christians, Arabia, Mecca, Character of Mohammed, Description of Africa, the Mohammedans in Central Africa.

LIBERTY. Ancient Europe, Invasion of the Germans, the Castle, the Town, the Church, Venice, Arab Spain, the Portuguese, Discoverers, the Slave Trade, Abolition in Europe, Abolition in America, Materials of Human History.

INTELLECT. Animal Period of the Earth, Origin of Man, and Early History, Summary of Universal History, The Future of the Human Race, The Religion of Reason and Love.

Price reduced from $1.75 to $1.00. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER, 28 Lafayette place, New York.

RELIGION A CURSE, RELIGION A DISEASE, RELIGION A LIE.

By Samuel P. Putnam.

Dedicated to the American Congress, of 1892, which for the sake of Religion, Stabbed Liberty to the Heart.

A work burning with indignation inspired by the Congressional act closing the World's Fair on Sunday—an act which practically united the government and the Christian church.

To which is added Mr. Putnam's address delivered before the Columbian Exposition Committee of the House of Representatives against Sunday closing.

Also the following Essays and Poems by Mr. Putnam, which have never before been put in book form: Orthodoxy; Freethought; Man, Not God (written for a Paine anniversary); The Statue of Liberty and Thomas Paine; a poem written for the opening exercises of the Silverton, Ore., Freethought Hall; Death and Life; The Golden Age; Shut the Door (a poem on the closing of the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia, in 1876).

The main essay in this work is one of the strongest arraignments ever made of the religion which cramps and fetters the minds of the people of this country. It should be distributed widely. It has been commended in the highest terms as it appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER and we hope every reader will buy a copy to lend his neighbor and arouse thought.

A WELL-KNOWN minister succeeded in so shocking his congregation a few nights ago that several of the ladies fainted outright, while two or three had to be carried bodily from the church and resuscitated in the fresh air. The preacher was expatiating upon the merits or demerits of Solomon, as the case may hav been, when he came to the place where Solomon began taking unto himself his eight hundred wives. "Solomon," said the holy man, iifting his hands above his head and gazing sorrowfully at the roof of the church. "Solomon was, my dear friends—Solomon was—he was a regular Billy Breckinridge sort of a man." Just here he paused. There was an awed hush, followed by a smothered groan that came from the center of the church. The preacher tried to correct himself, but it was too late, and his apology was almost as bad as the original remark. His sermon closed almost immediately.—Louisville Evening Post.

A SOUTHERN clergymen having a "roving commission" and whose great forte was in addressing the children at Sunday-schools commenced his remarks in Brooklyn by stating that on his way Northward he had on previous Sundays addressed children at Baltimore. Then he went to Philadelphia, thence to New York, and from Brooklyn he should go to Boston. After giving his hearers most excellent advice as to how they were to conduct themselvs in this world in order to obtain an entrance into heaven, he added: "But if—but if—my dear little boys and my dear little girls, you neglect the opportunities you now hav you will go to hell." Then, wishing to ascertain how attentiv his audience had been, he tested their memories with the following questions: "Where did I say I first commenced addressing Sunday-school children?" A dozen voices answered, "In Baltimore." "Where did I go next?" "To Philadelphia," was the response. "And then." "To New York." "And where did I say I was going from Brooklyn?" "To hell!" was the unexpected and unsatisfactory answer and anything but complimentary to the modern Athens.—Boston Times.

THE FIRST HYLO-IDEALIST.

A jellyfish swam in a tropical sea,
And he said: "This world it consists of Me;
There's nothing above and nothing below
That a jellyfish ever can possibly know
(Since we've got no sight or hearing or smell)
Beyond what our single sense can tell.
Now, all that I learned from the sense of touch
Is the fact of my feelings, viewed as such,
But to think they hav any external cause
Is an inference clean against logical laws.
Again, to suppose, as I've hitherto done,
There are other jellyfish under the sun,
Is a pure assumption that can't be backed
By a jot of proof or a single fact.
In short, like Hume, I very much doubt
If there's anything else at all without.
So I come at last to the plain conclusion,
When the subject is fairly set free from confusion,
That the universe simply centers in Me.
And if I were not, then nothing would be."

That minute a shark, who was strolling by,
Just gulped him down in the twink of an eye;
And he died with a few convulsiv twists,
But, somehow, the universe still exists.

Miss Wixon has taken as her mottoes in writing this beautiful book of 292 pages—which she has dedicated to the memory of her father and mother—these sentences from the works of a great synthetic philosopher and a gifted liberal minister:

As with the physical, so with the ethical. A belief, as yet fitful and partial, is beginning to spread amongst men, that here, also, there is an indissoluble bond between cause and consequence, an inexorable destiny, a law which altereth not.—Herbert Spencer.

Living is an Art, a method of expressing great conceptions; in fact, the highest method, the noblest of the Arts.—Thomas Starr King.

Pleasure and Progress.

AN ATTEMPT TO PROVE THAT

The Pursuit of Pleasure is the Sine Qua Non of Intellectual, Moral, and Social Development, and that The Promotion of Pleasure is the Duty of Philanthropy and Statesmanship.

By Albert M. Lorentz, LL.B.

CONTENTS:

BOOK I.—PLEASURE: Chap. I.—Sources of Pleasure. Chap. II.—Material Pleasures. Chap. III.—Ideal Pleasures. Chap IV.—Social Pleasures. Chap. V.—Pleasures of the Savage, the Barbarian and the Civilized. Chap. VI.—Genesis of religions. Chap. VII.—Christianity.

BOOK II.—INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT: Chap. I.—Purpose of life. Chap. II.—Material Pleasures. Chap. III.—Ideal Pleasures: Knowledge. Chap. IV.—Ideal Pleasures: Reason. Chap.—V. Ideal Pleasures: Character. Chap. VI.—Social Pleasures. Chap. VII.—Pedagogical Despotism.

BOOK III.—MORAL DEVELOPMENT: Chap. I.—Morality. Chap. II.—Material Pleasures: Prudence. Chap. III.—Material Pleasures; Refinement. Chap. IV.—Ideal Pleasures: Foresight, Chap. V.—Ideal Pleasures: Civilization. Chap. VI.—Social Pleasures. Chap. VII.—Vice Caused by Restraint.

BOOK IV.—SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT: Chap. I.—Progress. Chap. II.—Protection, Capitalism, and Socialism: Respectivly an Actual, an Imminent, and a Proposed Violation of Individual Sovereignty. Chap. III—Condition of Agriculture. Chap. IV. Public Schools, the Mene, Mene, Tekel of Socialism Chap. V.—Province of Government. Chap. VI.—Our Social Disorder.

Here are some of the verdicts on this remarkable production which have been rendered by men who are in every way qualified as judges of books:

This is a spirited, rattling sort of a book that skates right along over the deepest subject without much thought whether the ice is thin or not. It answers the greatest question—What is the us, object, motive, purpose, and summum bonum of life, and the real cause and motive of progress? —by one word, Pleasure!—Thaddeus B. Wakeman.

He sharply attacks, also, modern methods of education, and in this he is most abundantly borne out by the facts, and his arraignment is practically unanswerable. His book is altogether a curious and suggestive one.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

The man who wrote this book knows how to write a book, and knows what he is writing about. There is not a padded sentence in the volume, not an attempt to fill up with words for lack of knowledge. The author deals hard blows at shams and falsehoods, and hard blows for realities and truth. We do not see how anyone can read this book and disagree with the leading propositions. The work is good; every chapter is worth reading. It is a work of common-sense Socialism. The chapter on public schools ought to be put into a tract and sent to every teacher in the land. Thousands of sentences are worthy of being framed as political maxims and hung up all over the nation. the book deserves a wide reading, not only for its literary style, which is clear and incisive, but for is bold, honest sayings.—L. K. Washburn.

After you read this book you will be as enthusiastic in praise of it as are the eloquent editor of the Investigator and the gallant President of the Canadian Secular Union,

The Creation of God.

By DR. JACOB HARTMANN.

An explanation of the origin of the God Idea, and the mental processes that led to the formation of idols and the worship of them. From the time of Terah's apostasy, Abraham's reformation and his banishment for heresy and blasphemy against the Chaldean idols, to Christ's coming, the principal characters are analyzed and shown to be human, by thought and deed. It is made plain that the peculiar phraseology, cant sayings, subterfuges, miracles, wonder-workings, and supernatural padding are the proper offspring of the then existing barbarism, ignorance, and superstition, constituting the peculiar politics of the day.

APOLLONIUS OF TYANA IDENTIFIED AS THE CHRISTIAN JESUS.

An important and remarkable revelation concerning the life and times of Apollonius of Tyana, the great sage and philosopher of the first century. It is here claimed that his life and teachings were appropriated and utilized by the formulators of the Christian religion in the interest of so-called Christianity. The plagiarism is made plain in this brief history of Apollonius, especially in view of the historical references and comments thereon. It is quite evident that to conceal the plagiarism, the name of Apollonius was suppressed.

Gems of Thought.

THERE is great danger in encouraginng a people to expect impossible things.—Galveston News.

WHEN a country is well-governed, poverty and mean conditions are things to be ashamed of; when a country is ill-governed riches and honor are things to be ashamed of.—Confucius.

LET us always strive for that last and best product of the growing race, the sane and equal mind, serenely poised, self-centered, confident of its own integrity, vigilant toward its own defects, infinitely charitable toward the defects of others—pivoted on principle.—Wayland H. Smith.

WHAT makes a man a good Christian does not make him a good man. This is one criticism of Christianity. Another is that this religion is false, utterly false; it is based upon what never took place, and it endeavors to build itself up by trying to snare people into believing what will not take place.—Investigator.

THE competitiv gymnastics of the future will turn hundreds of boy-topers into young athletes. Oswald.*

NECESSARY and eternal as are its truths, all science concerns all mankind for all time. Equally at present and in the remotest future, must it be of incalculable importance for the regulation of their conduct that men should understand the science of life, physical, mental, and social; and that they should understand all other science as a key to the science of life.—Herbert Spencer.

I HAV protested for equal freedom. Equal freedom sweeps off as by one hand all the objections of authority. In a world surrendered to this principle men would be happy and justice would be done. Equal freedom dispossesses the robber. It never takes from him from whom should not be taken. It sets the value of honor up, and reduces spoliation to its proper level.—Horace L. Traubel.

WHAT knowest thou, man, of life? and yet, for ever twixt the womb, the grave,
Thou pratest of the coming life, of heaven and hell thou fain must rave.

The world is old and thou art young; the world is large and thou art small;
Cease, atom of a moment's span, to hold thyself an all-in-all.

—Háji Abdú El-Yezdí.

DANIEL WEBSTER was a great man and a great orator, but he did not become great by merely imitating some one else. But you can no more trim the natural power within you to a pattern than you can increase or diminish your stature. I cannot understand why any man should want to formulate himself to the identity of some one else. There is hardly any individuality which is not worthy of the closest observation.—Henry Irving.

No indwelling deity now regulates the life of the burning sun, no guardian angels drive the stars across the arching firmament; the divine Ganges is water flowing down into the sea to evaporate into cloud and descend again in rain. No deity simmers in the boiling pot, no presiding spirits dwellin the volcanos, no imprisoned demon shrieks from the mouth of the howling lunatic. There was a period of human thought when the whole universe seemed actuated by spiritual life. For our knowledge of our own history, it is deeply interesting that there should remain rude races yet living under the philosophy which we hav so far passed from since physics, chemistry, biology, hav seized whole provinces of ancient Animism, setting force for life, and law for will.—Dr. E. B. Tylor.

HE [Jesus] was wanting in filial love and duty to his own parents, in brotherly affection to his own family. He plainly taught men to love him best. "He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me," and many more words to that effect. He was abusiv in his vituperation against certain individuals, calling them frightful names. "Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell?" His manners were not always such as to be followed; and he betrayed the weakness of much self-conceit, promising rewards to his followers, and threatening with perdition those who rejected him. If the New Testament, which records all this, be true, then Christ is neither a God to be worshiped, nor a teacher to be implicitly trusted, nor an exemplar to be in all things followed. From first to last, and with only one exception, I reject the foregoing Christian dogmas on moral grounds alone. — Rev. Charles Vorsey.

THE HOLY CROSS SERIES.

The Popes and Their Doings. Biographical sketches of the most noted of these vicars of Christ and vicegerents of God, showing what they have done, and what kind of men they were. It contains very plain statements, in very unvarnished language, and the unmasking is complete, proving them to have been cruel, intriguing, and licentious men. Considering the rapid growth of Catholicism in this country, this book cannot be too widely disseminated. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Awful Disclosures of Maria Monk, as exhibited in a narrative of her sufferings during her residence of five years as a novice, and two years as a black nun, in the Hotel Dieu Nunnery, at Montreal. Perhaps not any anti-Catholic book published has created more excitement, and had such a circulation as this work. To counteract its effects the Catholics circulated a story that Maria Monk was "no better than she should be," but investigation disclosed that her "child of shame" was none other than the child of her priest-seducer. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth 75 cents.

Auricular Confession and Popish Nunneries. By Wm. Hogan, for twenty-five years a confessing priest. A revelation of the licentious practices of the priests and nuns in these religious brothels. There is no question that Ex-priest Hogan knew the truth of the tales of vice, seduction, and infanticide he gives in this volume, and equally there is no question that if the people generally knew of them, Catholicism would not be given the vast amounts of money now allowed it by our various city governments. Price, paper, 50 cents, cloth 75 cents.

The Priest in Absolution. A Review of the system of auricular confession, including copious extracts from the "Confessional Unmasked," from the "Master Key to Popery," etc. The work is a protest against and an appeal to every American citizen to examine carefully and thoughtfully a religious system so invasive of privacy, so powerful for evil in licentious hands, so fraught with danger to female modesty, to the ingenuous openness of youth, and to the freedom of thought, speech, and action. Price, paper, 25 cents.

Priestly Celibacy Exposed A lecture by the Rev. Geo. Townsend Fox, of Durham, England. Revised American edition, showing the result in parishes of the Roman decree that priests shall not marry. Price, paper, 15 cents.

Sister Lucy and Her Awful Disclosures Respecting New Hall Convent, Boreham, Essex, England. Showing that convents are inimical to chastity, virtue, and freedom. Price, paper, 10 cents.

"SPECIAL PAINE MEMORIAL, ILLUSTRATED"

Issue June 2d, Ready May 30th.

Price, per copy, 7 cents; five or more, 5 cents each.

Every one of our readers should send for one to ten or more extra copies.

Agents and subscribers and Liberal societies are specially urged to give this number of THE TRUTH SEEKER the widest circulation. It will be historical. It will be interesting from first to last page. It is intended as a modest tribute to one of the men who were equal to America's need in the "times that tried men's souls." America is not longer justified in the policy of silence as to Thomas Paine's grand-hearted work in the cause of American Independence and humanity. And Americans should know of him that they may for themselves judge if he does not deserve a generous, candid "well-done" in the pages of American history. Justice may come slowly but come it will, when views are so broadened as not to take the traditional say-so of the misinformed or malicious, as truth. We therefore would ask the cordial interest of every reader, that he will do his little or much—we want all to assist in placing the immortal name of Thomas Paine where it rightfully belongs, and you can help in the way we indicate, and we hope you will.

Below find order-blank. If you prefer it and will give list of names covering copies you order, we will attend to prompt mailing. THE TRUTH SEEKER CO., 28 Lafayette Pl., New York,

Col. R. G. Ingersoll's ARGUMENT

IN THE

Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,

At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

By LOUIS BARKAN, M.D.

Fordyce Barker, M.D., Professor Bellevue Medical College says of it, writing to the author: "I regard your book as the most sound, sensible, and useful book on the topics which it discusses that I hav met with. I wish it could be in the hands of every intelligent head of a family. I am particularly pleased with one feature of it that it does not profess to teach dosing and drugging. I congratulate you on the wisdom and success of this effort."

Other noted physicians recommend it just as highly.

A GENEROUS PARENT SHOULD SAY: "IF THERE MUST BE TROUBLE, LET IT BE IN MY DAY, THAT MY CHILD MAY HAV PEACE."

ANY SYSTEM OF RELIGION THAT HAS ANYTHING IN IT THAT SHOCKS THE MIND OF A CHILD CANNOT BE A TRUE SYSTEM.

CERTAIN I AM, THAT WHEN OPINIONS ARE FREE, EITHER IN MATTERS OF GOVERNMENT OR RELIGION, TRUTH WILL FINALLY AND POWERFULLY PREVAIL.

MAN HAS NO PROPERTY IN MAN.

I BELIEVE IN THE EQUALITY OF MAN I BELIEVE DUTIES CONSIST IN DOING JUSTICE, LOVING MERCY, AND ENDEAVORING TO MAKE OUR FELLOW CREATURES HAPPY.

WHO ART THOU, VAIN DUST AND ASHES! BY WHATEVER NAME THOU ART CALLED—WHETHER A KING, A BISHOP, A CHURCH, OR A STATE, A PARLIAMENT OR ANYTHING ELSE—THAT OBTRUDEST THINE INSIGNIFICANCE BETWEEN THE SOUL OF MAN AND HIS MAKER?

PAINE: THE KNIGHT-ERRANT OF FREEDOM.

A MEMORIAL DAY POEM.

I

BRING laurel wreaths for the Nation's dead,
And flowers for the graves of the men who fell—
Who fell where furrow and field ran red—
To crash of cannon and shriek of shell.
Bring words of praise from the living tongue,
Extol their deeds with the breath of flame;
You cannot brighten the glory flung
Athwart their tombs by the sun of Fame.

II

The starry banner of this loved land,
That loyal winds for an age had tost,
Felt at her halliards a hostile hand,
And trailed in the dust of a risen host.
These heroes whose ashes 'neath us lie,
By a spirit guided from out the past,
Restored the flag to her native sky,
And died in the shadow Old Glory cast.

III

But pause not now, with the tribute paid
To those who breasted the waves of war,
For Justice bids that a word be said
Yet stronger, clearer and louder far.
For ne'er was soldier that fought and bore
The brunt of battle—set others free—
But some great genius has moved before,
And pointed the way to liberty.

IV

Who made the cause of the slave his own,
Defied the power of a robber king,
Spoke out for right with a trumpet tone,
And wrote with a pen from the eagle's wing?
I say the leader in all the wars
That strike the fetters from limbs and brain—
The bonds of iron or creeds or laws—
Is the leader we honor—Thomas Paine.

V

O Champion, bravest in all the past!
O Freedom, fairest of all the dames!
Long may the pledge of your fealty last,
For ever united be your names.
And long as flowers from the sod shall spring,
Touched by the warmth of a May day bright,
A blossom and tear shall the lady bring
To drop on the grave of her faithful knight.

Thomas Paine, the Advocate of Liberty and Justice.

"Come, workers, here was a teacher, and the lesson he taught was good:
There are no classes or races, but one human brotherhood;
There are no creeds to be hated, no colors of skin debarred;
Mankind is one in its rights and wrongs—one right, one hope, one guard.
By his life he taught, by his death we learn, the great reformer's creed:
The right to be free, and the hope to be just, and the guard against selfish greed."

The grand tribute of John Boyle O'Reilly to Wendell Phillips, the "silver-tongued" champion of the slave in the later days of the republic, is no less applicable to Thomas Paine, the first and most faithful pleader for the oppressed in the nation's infancy. The man whose memory we honor on each recurring twenty-ninth of January and whose memorial at New Rochelle we this year decorate, sent to the Pennsylvania Magazine the first protest against the buying and selling of the black man that flowed from the pen of an American patriot, and never while life remained in the hand that held that pen did the heart that impelled it grow lukewarm, or the brain that guided it become weary in the propaganda of freedom which the shortsightedness and cupidity of our people permitted to drag its way along through generation after generation until the few thousand slaves of Paine's time had multiplied into four millions and until their chains could be melted only in the white heat of one of the most terrible wars that ever desolated the world. Even Jefferson faltered and Washington bent before the storm. The slave-power asserted itself in that early day and the most illustrious of our statesmen surrendered or stifled their convictions at its behest. But the man whom priests hate and malign and freemen love and honor never for one moment quailed or compromised. Thomas Paine, who, it is only just to say, did more than any other man to secure the independence of this country, stood by his antislavery principles, denouncing, as only he could denounce, the crime of human bondage, and imploring his fellow citizens who had fought and suffered in the cause of political independence not to longer stultify themselvs by condoning or defending the enslavement of men whose skins were black but whose equal and inalienable rights had been affirmed in that immortal Declaration which was all inclusiv in its averment of the birthright to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Had government and people acted upon the admonitions of Thomas Paine, how different would hav been the history of the United States! What a heritage of blood and agony and hate and war lust we hav received from the generations which flouted the teachings of Paine! What a heritage of peace and joy and love we should hav received from those generations had they been liberty-loving and wise enough to perceive and act in accordance with the principles of universal freedom which the author of the "Rights of Man" never for one moment doubted or betrayed!

Reading the two large volumes of Conway's Life of Paine, one cannot fail to be struck by the frequent references to the Author-Patriot's work in behalf of the slaves. On Page 41 there is a letter from Dr. Rush, one of the earliest and most untiring of the revolutionary abolitionists, in which he, referring to his first meeting with Paine, says: "We met · · · in Mr. Aitkin's bookstore, where I did homage to his principles and pen upon the subject of the enslaved Africans. He told me the essay to which I alluded was the first thing he had ever published in his life." On page 52, Conway, speaking of the same article, remarks: "Paine's paper is as thorough as Garrison himself could hav made it. And, indeed, it is remarkable that Garrison, at a time when he shared the common prejudices against Paine, printed at the head of his Liberator a motto closely resembling Paine's. The motto of Paine was: 'The world is my country, my religion is to do good;' that of the Liberator: 'Our country is the world, our countrymen are all mankind.' Garrison did characteristic justice to Paine when he had outgrown early prejudices against him." In the Pennsylvania Journal of Oct. 18, 1775, Paine expressed the hope that when America should no longer depend upon Great Britain, our first expression of gratitude should be "an act of continental legislation, which shall put a stop to the importation of negroes for sale, soften the hard fate of those already here, and in time procure their freedom." Again Conway says:

"At this time Paine saw much of Jefferson, and there can be little doubt that the antislavery clause struck out of the Declaration was written by Paine, or by some one who had Paine's antislavery essay before him. · · · Thus did Paine try to lay at the corner the stone which the builders rejected, and which afterwards ground their descendants to powder. Jefferson withdrew the clause on the objection of Georgia and South Carolina, which wanted slaves, and of Northerners interested in supplying them. That, however, was not known till all the parties were dead. Paine had no reason to suppose that the declaration of human freedom and equality, passed July 4th, could fail eventually to include the African slaves. The Declaration embodied every principle he had been asserting, and indeed Cobbett is correct in saying that whoever may hav written the Declaration Paine was its author.

On November 2, 1779, Paine was elected Clerk of the Pennsylvania Assembly. Conway observes:

"On the same day there was introduced into that Assembly an act for the abolition of slavery in the state, which then contained six thousand negro slaves. The body of this very moderate measure was prepared by George Bryan, but the much admired preamble has been attributed by tradition to the pen of Paine. That this tradition is correct is now easily proved by a comparison of its sentiments and phraseology with the antislavery writings of Paine presented in previous pages of this work. The author, who alone seems to hav been thinking of the Negroes and their rights during that revolutionary epoch, thus had some reward in writing the first proclamation of emancipation in America. The act passed March 1, 1780.

Writing from Paris on March 16, 1790, to a friend in Philadelphia, Paine says:

"I wish most anxiously to see my much loved America. It is the country from whence all reformation must originally spring. I despair of seeing an abolition of the infernal traffic in Negroes. We must push that matter further on your side of the water. I wish that a few well-instructed could be sent among their brethren in bondage, for until they are able to take their own part nothing will be done."

Shortly after his first arrival in America Paine perceived that slavery was sanctioned by the Old Testament, and he at once repudiated the authority of that volume. How different from the millions of Christians, whom nothing less than the thunders of Shiloh and Gettysburg and the capitulation of Appomatox could convince of the fallibility of that musty code!

We cannot resist the temptation to quote here Mr. Conway's admirable summary of the reforms advocated by the man who has been denounced and misrepresented as perhaps no other man has been in any age of the world, and that, too, by those who hav been among the most fortunate legatees of his priceless services to mankind. Here is the excerpt mentioned:

"Thus the Pennsylvania Magazine, in the time that Paine edited it, was a seed-bag from which the sower scattered the seeds of great reforms ripening with the progress of civilization. Through the more popular press he sowed also. Events sel cted his seeds of American independence, of republicau equality, freedom from royal, ecclesiastical, and hereditary privilege, for a swifter and more important harvest; but the whole circle of human ideas and principles was recognized by this lone wayfaring man. The first to urge extension of the principles of independence to the enslaved negro; the first to arraign monarchy, and to point out the danger of its survival in presidency; the first to propose articles of a more thorough nationality to the new-born states; the first to advocate international arbitration; the first to expose the absurdity and criminality of dueling; the first to suggest more rational ideas of marriage and divorce; the first to advocate national and international copyright; the first to plead for the animals; the first to demand justice for woman—what brilliants would our modern reformers hav contributed to a coronet for that man's brow, had he not presently worshiped the God of his fathers after the way that theologians call heresy!"

It is eighty-five years since Paine laid down his pen, and our country has passed through an awful crisis in that interval. Inventiv genius and industrial enterprise hav broadened beyond computation the area of cultivated land, developed our mining resources, and established manufactories without number and of great magnitude. Railway and telegraph lines belt the continent in almost every direction. A vast and complicated educational system extends its ramifications into every nook and corner of the land. Immigration and domestic increase hav swelled our population to sixty-five millions. And yet, so far as religious and political liberty is concerned, we hav made no advance since Paine's day except on lines pointed out by him. We are in practice, in some things, where he was in principle one hundred years ago; yes, where he was in 1775. In other directions we stumble blindly where he walked with clear eyes and sure feet. We and our fathers hav contemned the justice he loved and denied the liberty of thought and action to the establishment of which he gave his life's services. It is not so often that the man to whom a generation builds monuments was wiser concerning the problems that confront that generation than it is itself. But Paine was. Not only was he of more lucid thought, as regarded the issues of his own age, than were his contemporaries, but he also reasoned more justly than the priests and politicians three generations removed from his time. As a rule it is true that "each new decade must hav new men to determin its liberty," but, so far as humanity must deal with the questions of religious and civil rights, Paine was a man for all decades. How he would hav thrilled responsiv to the ringing music and the lofty sentiment of these lines of the poet before quoted:

"It is not enough to win rights from a king and write them down in a book:
New men, new lights, and the fathers' code the sons may never brook.
What is liberty now were license then; their freedom our yoke would be,
And each new decade must hav new men to determin its liberty.
Mankind is a marching army with a broadening front the while;
Shall it crowd its bulk on the farm-paths, or clear to the outward file?
Its pioneers are the dreamers who heed neither tongue nor pen
Of the human spiders whose silk is wove from the lives of toiling men."

Madam Bonneville, in her sketch of the life and character of Paine, says that about a week after his death a headstone was put up bearing the inscription: "Thomas Paine, Author of 'Common Sense,' died the eighth of June, 1809, aged 72 years." By Paine's will a wall twelve feet square was built around the grave. Two weeping willows and two cypresses were planted outside. Many persons, especially foreigners, took away parts of the tombstone and trees as mementoes. The grave is situated at the angle of the farm, by the entrance to it. The eighty-eight acres of the north part were sold at $25 per acre. The half of the south (the share of Thomas de Bonneville) sold for a total of $1425. The remainder of the south part (Benjamin de Bonneville's share) was sold in lots, reserving the monument lot, forty-five feet square. The old farmhouse homestead was about a quarter of a mile from the grave. A monument was erected in 1839. It became defaced by the weather and the hands of vandals and relic hunters, and in 1881 THE TRUTH SEEKER raised a fund to secure its rehabilitation. The restoration cost about $200. On the 30th of May of that year a large number of the Liberals of the East gathered about the monument and re dedicated it with appropriate exercises. P. L McClellan, of Mount Vernon, was elected president and D. M. Bennett, vice-president. Following the president's opening speech came addresses by T. B. Wakeman, J. P. Mendum, Dr. T. L. Brown, Courtlandt Palmer, D. M. Bennett, S. P. Putnam, and Mr. Wright. Ella M. Hart read a poem and Mrs. H. Allen a prose tribute.

The present work of repairing the monument is being done under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philosophical Association, and is paid for by Mr. Robert H. Barry. Mr. Barry was once a Roman Catholic, but has long since outgrown that faith. To him credit is due for his generosity.

The monument is of Westchester marble, is about twelve feet in hight and three feet square at the base. Base, capstone, and cornice of Ionic order. It is covered with inscriptions on the four sides, chiefly extracts from the hero's works. "On the west side is a profile of Paine, by an Italian artist, and encircled by a wreath." The Monument is situated on the White Plains and New Rochelle road, while on the north side runs the road leading to the farmhouse.

In the little cortege that on June 10, 1809, followed the remains of Thomas Paine to West Chester, walked two of the enslaved race. Says Conway: "Those two negroes, traveling twenty-five miles on foot, represented the homage of a race for whose deliverance Paine had pleaded from his first essay written in America to his recent entreaty for the president's intervention in behalf of the slaughtered negroes of Domingo." Of the scene at the graveyard Conway has given us the blood-quickening picture:

"The grand people of America were not there, the clergy were not there, but beside the negroes stood the Quaker preacher and the French Catholic woman. Madam Bonneville placed her son Benjamin—afterwards general in the United States army—at the end of the grave, and standing herself at the other end, cried, as the earth fell on the coffin: 'Oh, Mr. Paine, my son stands here as testimony of the gratitude of America, and I for France!'"

Of Paine's personal appearance Madam Bonneville says: "Thomas Paine was five feet nine inches high. · · · His bust was well proportioned and his face oblong. Reflection was the great expression of his face, in which was always seen the calm proceeding from a conscience void of reproach. His eye, which was black, was lively and piercing. · · · He stood and walked upright without stiffness or affectation." Conway adds: "He had a prominent nose, somewhat like that of Ralph Waldo Emerson. · · · Paine's mouth was delicate, his chin also. He wore no whiskers or beard until too feeble with age to shave. His forehead was lofty and unfurrowed; his head long, the occiput feeble. His complexion was ruddy—thoroughly English. · · · He was an expert horseman, and, in health, an unwearied walker. He loved music, and could join well in a chorus."

Mr. Moncure D. Conway is constantly adding to his previous discoveries concerning Paine. His fields of exploration, since he was last in the United States, are Paris and London. The more we know of the life and labors of Thomas Paine, the more we admire him, and the more keenly do we regret the ignorance of our people as regards his character and services.

At the annual conference of the National Secular Society, at Liverpool, Mr. George W. Foote was unanimously reëlected president. He is the right man in the right place and this indorsement by the English Secularists, coming so soon after the "Atheist Shoemaker"-Foote-Holyoake-Hughes controversy, is peculiarly significant and decidedly gratifying. American Freethinkers hav a very warm place in their affections for both Mr. Foote and the society over which he presides. Long life and great prosperity to both.

Three members of the New York Constitutional Convention—Messrs. D. H. McMillan, A. L. Kellogg, and B. S. Dean—hav introduced amendments providing for the taxation of all private property.

We shall soon present to our readers the opinions of college presidents and professors and county treasurers of this state on the subject of church taxation. Look out for that issue. It will be interesting.

The following donations for the purposes of the Freethought Federation are acknowledged: J. P. Palmer, $2; John Helm, 40 cents; A. A. Raymond, $1; Mrs. M. M. Tarbell, $1; J. B. Puffer, $1; Abner Kimball, $1; S. F. de Jones, $1.

One of the amendments offered in the Constitutional Convention is intended to prevent the imprisonment of any person for more than ten months, when held awaiting trial. It should be ten days rather than ten months. Every person is presumably innocent until adjudged guilty, and is entitled, under the Constitution and in equity, to a speedy trial. Our so-called system of justice is, in many respects, antiquated and cruel. One of its outrages is the holding of witnesses, sometimes for years, in the house of detention.

We hav mailed to each Senator and Representativ in Congress a copy of a sixteen page protest against the Gallinger-Morse and Kyle-Johnson Sunday bills now pending in the national legislature. With each package was inclosed a copy of Louis Levine's admirable letter to the members of the committees to which the bills were referred. These will also be sent to the most influential papers of the country. The Protest pamphlet sells for five cents; twenty-five copies, three cents each; one hundred copies, $2. It should be widely distributed. The people must be educated that the Sunday tyrants may be thwarted.

Members of the Freethought Letter-Writing Corps (except those in New York state, who are assigned to special work) will this week write to the Representativ in Congress from their district, or to one of their Senators, regarding the Kyle-Johnson and Morse-Gallinger Sunday bills. We hav just sent to all Representativs and Senators some arguments against these bills and we hope that every one of our national law-makers will receive from his Freethought constituents letters urging him to carefully examin those arguments and vote against all laws which seek to force all the people to do reverence to the holy day of one class of citizens.

The prospects are that the fight for equal taxation will soon be on in earnest in the Constitutional Convention. We are sending out thousands of copies of "Church Property," and have good reason to hope that much of this seed will fall on rich, warm soil, where it will quickly germinate and develop a healthy growth, to ere long ripen for the harvest day of justice. No doubt the Freethinkers, particularly those of this State, will realize the necessity of acting promptly and effectively. Mr. Putnam was at Albany last week. To meet the expenses incurred in his work, and in distributing "Church Property," the fund at disposal for both purposes should be kept replenished.

Let every Liberal in the state of New York write immediately and often to the Committee on State Finances and Taxation of the Constitutional Convention, asking that church property be taxed equally with all other private wealth. This will be the work of the New York section of the Freethought Letter-writing Corps while the Convention is in session. Write also to the delegate from your district. If you can, induce your local paper to admit arguments in favor of this measure of justice. The members of the above-named committee are:

Milo M. Acker (chairman), Hornellsville; Commodore P. Vedder, Ellicottville; I. S. Johnson, Warsaw; Owen Cassidy, Havana: A. B. Steele, Herkimer; S. B. Jacobs, Brooklyn; O. A. Fuller, Wellsville: F. B. F. Tibbetts, Ithaca; C. R. Pratt, Elmira; A. L. Kellogg, Oneonta; F. T. Fitzgerald, W. McM. Speer, Nelson Smith, W. P. Burr, M. J. Mulqueen, J. W. McLaughlin, S. S. Blake, New York.

THOMAS PAINE.

Author and Hero of the Times that Tried Men's Souls, HONORED BY BOTH PAST AND PRESENT.

Tributes from Those Who Knew Him in Life and from Those Who Revere His Memory To-day.

A POWER IN AMERICA, FRANCE, ENGLAND.

But few, who hav not specially examined the subject, realize the great and beneficent influence which Paine's writings hav exerted and are still destined to exert. He was, as is well known, one of the chief instigators and promoters of the American Revolution, and also one of the most earnest and zealous workers in the brave struggle of the colonies for freedom and independence.

His success and popularity in America insured him an enthusiastic welcome in France, where he was elected a deputy to the National Convention from two different departments. The revolution in France, after many excesses and reverses, has at length proved successful, and the republic there, as in America, is permanently established.

In England, the revolutionary spirit was also invoked; but, unfortunately, suppressed by the strong hand of power, aided by bribery and treachery.

"The French Revolution," says James Cheetham, "that terrible concussion which had perniciously effected all Europe, and particularly England, had prepared the clubs for the unhinging doctrins of the 'Rights of Man.' Never did the parched earth receive refreshing rain with more welcome than that with which the revolutionary people of England admitted amongst them the tumultuous writings of Thomas Paine. To that which was his object; to commotion, to the overthrow of the government, and to bloodshed, in all its horrid forms, they were rapidly hastening. Thus predisposed, the cordiality and enthusiasm with which the first part of the 'Rights of Man' was greeted, although flattering to the vanity and encouraging to the hopes of the author, were not surprising. The clubs, zealous to a degree of frenzy; always vigilant, always alert, published a groat edition of thirty thousand copies of the work, which was distributed amongst the poor, who could not afford to purchase. In the great manufacturing towns, Paine was considered by the ignorant as an apostle of freedom. A song was privately circulated beginning with—

God save great Thomas Paine,
His 'Rights of Man' proclaim,
From pole to pole!

"The government, alarmed, knew not how to meet the evil. Burke did, however, by his successiv and impressiv appeals, animate them to precautionary measures."

This is the language of James Cheetham, the enemy of Paine, and the convicted libeler of Madam Bonneville. But Cheetham, whose writings cannot always be relied upon, may be believed when he is forced, as in the present instance, to admit, most unwillingly, the great influence of Paine's writings upon the masses.

Before Paine announced in the "Age of Reason" his belief in "one God and no more," no writer in Europe or America was more popular and respected; but when Christians realized that the great author's religion was Deism and not Trinitarianism nor Catholicism, their former friendship was turned to enmity, and their admiration changed to hatred. His patriotic services were ungratefully ignored, his motivs misrepresented, his character basely slandered, and his memory maligned.

Still, there were many members of the community who believed in the religious views of Thomas Paine, and who also upheld his political doctrins. These formed a brave and gallant band who sturdily defended his memory from clerical assaults, and refuted many of the wicked slanders of his enemies. Their efforts to vindicate Paine's character were ably seconded by reformers of every kind—by Theists, Pantheists, Materialists, Agnostics, and Atheists—that is to say, by that numerous and worthy class of citizens whom Paine styled Infidels!

In the twenty-first chapter and twenty-fifth verse of the gospel of St. John, we are told that if the many things which Jesus did "should be written every one, I suppose even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written."

This romantic and apostolic statement, even if inspired, may not be absolutely true; but it is an indisputable fact that if all the libels which hav been written and published against Thomas Paine were printed in one book, they would form a volume much larger than both the Old and New Testaments combined.

Touchstone speaks of a lie seven times removed. That is, first, the retort courteous; second, the quip modest; third, the reply churlish; fourth, the reproof valiant; fifth, the countercheck quarrelsome; sixth, the lie circumstantial; seventh, the lie direct; but it would require greater genius than even the famed bard of Avon to describe and define all the various grades and varieties of misrepresentations, untruths, and absolute falsehoods with which Christian rancor has assailed the character of Thomas Paine.

The friend and companion of three presidents—Washington, Jefferson, and Monroe—the friend of Benjamin Franklin, Samuel Adams, De Witt Clinton, Joel Barlow, Benjamin Rush, and the most prominent patriots of the American Revolution—the associate of Count Volney, the Marquis de Lafayette, Condorcet, Brissot, Madam Roland, and the leaders of the Revolution in France, the companion of Clio Rickman, Mary Wollstonecraft, Horne Tooke, Dr. Priestley, Dr. Towers, Romney, the painter, Sharp, the engraver, Colonel Oswald, etc., etc., in England, has been described by Christian writers as a drunkard, a debauchee, and an outcast, while the plain truth is, that he was temperate, unselfish, patriotic, and the devoted friend of mankind.

At the present day the number of Paine's friends has become so great and their influence so potent, that only the most reckless and audacious of romancers now venture to repeat the stale, well-worn, and oft-refuted slanders of former years, and, as a consequence, more tolerant and rational views in regard to his character are becoming prevalent in the community.

The spirit of inquiry is also abroad, and has greatly modified the religious bigotry of former years. The advance of science—the diffusion of knowledge—the criticisms of the learned—the teachings of the emancipated—hav produced their salutary effects. Doubts hav arisen, questions hav been propounded, and reasons hav been advanced, and Heresy—the fair child of Wisdom and Knowledge—has not only traveled from pews to pulpit, but has even invaded schools, seminaries, and colleges—the very nurseries of faith and doctrin—the sacred strongholds of orthodox theology.

In the first page of the first part of the "Age of Reason," Mr. Paine tells us, that he had intended to publish his thoughts upon religion at an advanced period of life, when the purity of the motiv could not admit of a question. In the preface to the second part of the same work, and also in a letter to his friend Samuel Adams, he tells us why he published his religious views sooner than he had intended.

"I saw," says he, "my life in continual danger. My friends were falling as fast as the guillotin could cut their heads off, and as I expected every day the same fate, I resolved to begin my work. This accounts for my writing at the time I did, and so nicely did the time and intention meet, that I had not finished the first part of the work six hours before I was arrested and taken to prison.

"Toward the latter end of December" (1793), he continues, "a motion was made and carried to exclude foreigners from the convention. There were but two in it, Anacharsis Clootz and myself; and I saw I was particularly pointed at by Bourdon de l'Oise, in his speech on that motion."

Paine was guilty of having been born in England; he was also opposed to the guillotin, and had voted with the Girondists to spare the life of the king and royal family. He wished to temper justice with mercy—to destroy kingcraft, but to spare the king's life; and for advocating this leniency toward the dethroned monarch, he placed his own liberty and life in imminent danger.

It was among scenes like these—scenes of violence and bloodshed that disgraced the grandest revolution in the world's history—that Thomas Paine, the patriot and philosopher, with mind undaunted and serene, regardless of his own fate, and inspired only by his great love for humanity, penned his unanswerable protest against Venerable Error and Credulous Faith—and bequeathed to mankind his priceless and immortal work—the "Age of Reason."

The writings of Paine, like those of Shakspere, "are not for a day, but for all time," and the political principles he so ably taught—the moral truths he so earnestly enforced—will be remembered and commended whilst reason holds her throne and justice survives among mankind.

Paine loved his fellow-men—his life was dedicated to humanity—his writings aroused the world—his genius immortalized his name—his faith in democracy was sublime—his labors were crowned with success—his reward was neglect, obloquy, and scorn! PETER ECKLER.

George Washington Writes of Paine.

In a Letter to the Patriot.

Your presence may remind Congress of your past services to this country, and if it is in my power to impress them, command my best exertions with freedom, as they will be rendered cheerfully, by one who entertains a lively sense of the importance of your works.

In a Letter to Richard Henry Lee.

That his "Common Sense" and many of his "Crisis" were well timed and had a happy effect on the public mind, none I believe who will turn to the epocha at which they were published, will deny. That his services hav hitherto passed off unnoticed, is obvious to all.

In a Letter to General Joseph Read.

By private letters which I hav lately received from Virginia, I find that "Common Sense" is working a powerful change there in the minds of many men.

A few more such flaming arguments as were exhibited at Falmouth and Norfolk, added to the sound doctrin and unanswerable reasoning contained in the pamphlet "Common Sense," will not leave numbers at a loss to decide on the propriety of a separation.

What Thomas Jefferson Thought of Him.

In a Letter to Francis Eppes.

You ask my opinion of Lord Bolingbroke and Thomas Paine. They were alike in making bitter enemies of the priests and pharisees of their day. Both were honest men; both advocates for human liberty. · · · These two persons differed remarkably in the style of their writing, each leaving a model of what is most perfect in both extremes of the simple and the sublime. No writer has exceeded Paine in ease and familiarity of style, in perspicuity of expression, happiness of elucidation, and in simple and unassuming language. In this he may be compared with Dr. Franklin.

To Paine, Tendering him Passage, in a National Vessel, from France to the United States.

I am in hopes you will find us returned generally to sentiments worthy of former times. In these it will be your glory to have steadily labored, and with as much affect as any man living. That you may long liv to continue your useful labors and to reap the reward of the thankfulness of nations, is my sincere prayer.

James Monroe's Glowing Words.

To Paine while in the Luxembourg Prison.

It is not necessary for me to tell you how much all your countrymen—I speak of the great mass of the people—are interested in your welfare. They hav not forgotten the history of their own Revolution, and the difficult scenes through which they had passed; nor do they review its several stages without reviving in their bosoms a due sensibility of the merits of those who served them in that great and arduous conflict. The crime of ingratitude has not yet stained, and I hope never will stain, our national character. You are considered by them as not only having rendered important services in our own Revolution, but as being, on a more extensiv scale, the friend of human rights, and a distinguished and able advocate in favor of public liberty. To the welfare of Thomas Paine the Americans are not, nor can they be, indifferent.

Benjamin Franklin Introduces Paine.

Letter to Duc de la Rochefoucauld.

The bearer of this is Mr. Paine, the author of a famous piece, entitled "Common Sense," published here with great effect on the minds of the people at the beginning of the Revolution. He is an ingenious, honest man; and as such I beg leave to recommend him to your civilities.

Dr. Benjamin Rush.

The First Appearance of "Common Sense."

At that time there was a certain Robert Bell, an intelligent Scotch printer and bookseller of Philadelphia, whom I knew to be as high-toned as Mr. Paine upon the subject of Independence. I mentioned the subject of the pamphlet to him, and he at once consented to run the risk of publishing it. The author and the printer were immediately brought together, and "Common Sense" burst from the press of the latter, in a few days, with an effect which has rarely been produced by types and paper, in any age or country

Major-General Charles Lee to Washington.

Two Days after Publication of "Common Sense."

Hav you seen the pamphlet "Common Sense"? I never saw such a masterly, irresistible performance. It will, if I mistake not, in concurrence with the transcendent folly and wickedness of the ministry, giv the coup de grace to Great Britain. In short, I own myself convinced by the arguments of the necessity of separation.

Joel Barlow, Poet and Statesman.

Intimate Friend of Paine.

He was one of the most benevolent and disinterested of mankind, endowed with the clearest perception, an uncommon share of original genius, and the greatest depth of thought. · · ·

He ought to be ranked among the brightest and undeviating luminaries of the age in which he lived.

As a visiting acquaintance and a literary friend, he was one of the most instructiv men I ever hav known. He had a surprising memory and a brilliant fancy. His mind was a storehouse of facts and useful observations. He was full of lively anecdote, and ingenious, original, pertinent remark upon almost every subject. · · ·

He was always charitable to the poor beyond his means, a sure protector and a friend to all Americans in distress that he found in foreign countries; and he had frequent occasion to exert his influence in protecting them during the Revolution in France. · · ·

His writings will answer for his patriotism.

William Cobbett, the Historian.

Old age having laid his hand upon this truly great man, this truly philosophical politician, at his expiring flambeau I lighted my taper. · · ·

I saw Paine first pointing the way, and then leading a nation through perils and difficulties of all sorts to Independence, and to lasting liberty, prosperity, and greatness.

Charles Phillips, Irish Barrister.

In "Loves of Celestine and St. Hubert."

Among these, there was one whom I could not help viewing with peculiar admiration, because, by the sole power of surprising genius, he had surmounted the disadvantages of birth and the difficulties of fortune. It was the celebrated Thomas Paine, a man who, no matter what may be the difference of opinion as to his principles, must ever remain a proud example of mind, unpatronized and unsupported, eclipsing the factitious beams of rank, and wealth, and pedigree! I never saw him in his captivity, or heard the revilings by which he has since been assailed, without cursing in my heart that ungenerous feeling which, cold to the necessities of genius, is clamorous in the publication of its defects. · · · Ye great ones of this nation! ye pretended moralists, so forward now to cast your interested indignation upon the memory of Paine, where were you in the day of his adversity? Which of you, to assist his infant merit, would diminish even the surplus of your debaucheries? Where the mitred charity—the practical religion? Consistent declaimers, rail on. What though his genius was the gift of heaven, his heart the altar of friendship? What, though wit and eloquence and anecdote flowed freely from his tongue, while conviction made her voice his messenger! What, though thrones trembled, and prejudice fled, and freedom came at his command! He dared to question the creed which you, believing, contradicted, and to despise the rank which you, boasting of, debased.

Abbe Sieyes, French Statesman.

Mr. Thomas Paine is one of those men who most contributed to the establishment of a republic in America. In England, his ardent love of humanity, and his hatred of every form of tyranny, prompted him to defend the French Revolution against the rhapsodical declamation of Mr. Burke. His "Rights of Man," translated into our language, is universally known, and where is the patriotic Frenchman who has not already, from the depths of his soul, thanked him for having fortified our cause with all the power of his reason and his reputation? It is with great pleasure that I embrace this occasion to offer him a tribute of my thankfulness and profound esteem, for the truly philanthropic use he makes of his distinguished talents.

Samuel Adams to Paine.

I hav frequently, with pleasure, reflected on your service to my nativ and your adopted country. Your "Common Sense" and your "Crisis" unquestionably awakened the public mind, and led the people loudly to call for a Declaration of our National Independence.

Judge Cooper.

Jefferson said: "One of the Ablest Men in America."

I was in Paris at this time (1792), but previous to my going there, Mr. Paine, whom I had met with at Mr. Johnson's, my bookseller, in St. Paul's churchyard, gave me letters of introduction to M. de Condorcet, and his wife, Madam de Condorcet, who read and spoke the English language with considerable facility. These letters introduced me to the interesting society of that very talented writer and his family. I found the letters of introduction of Mr. Paine honored with that attention which might be expected toward an estimable and distinguished man. · · · I hav dined with Mr. Paine in literary society, at Mr. Tiffins's, a merchant in London, at least a dozen times, when his dress, manners, and conversation were such as became the character of an unobtrusiv, intelligent gentleman accustomed to good society. · · · Paine's opinions on theological topics underwent no change before his death.

Samuel Bryan.

Secretary to the Council of Censors on Pennsylvania Constitution (1776).

This book, "Common Sense," may be called the book of Genesis, for it was the beginning. From this book sprang the Declaration of Independence, that not only laid the foundation of liberty in our own country, but the good of mankind throughout the world.

James Thompson Callender.

"Sketches of the History of America" (1798).

On titles, Thomas Paine has written with great success; and this is one reason why the friends of order hate him. Abuse of this author is now as naturally expected in a federal newspaper as tea and chocolate in a grocer's store. To such things compare two resolutions of Congress of the 26th of August and 3d of October, 1785. In consequence of his "early, unsolicited, and continued labors in explaining and enforcing the principles of the late Revolution, by ingenious and timely publications, upon the nature of liberty and civil government," they direct the board of treasury to pay him three thousand dollars. This attestation outweighs the clamor of the six per cent orators. They dread, they revile, and, if able, they would persecute Thomas Paine, because he possesses talents and courage sufficient to rend asunder the mantle of speculation, and to delineate the rickety growth of our public debt.

Dr. Ladd.

Poet of the Revolution.

Long liv the man, in early contest found,
Who spoke his heart when dastards trembled round;
Who, fired with more than Greek or Roman rage,
Flashed truth on tyrants from his manly page—
Immortal Paine! whose pen surprised we saw,
Could fashion empires while it kindled awe.
When first with awful front to crush her foes,
All bright in glittering arms, Columbia rose,
From thee our sons the generous mandate took,
As if from heaven some oracle had spoke;
And when thy pen revealed the grand design,
'Twas done—Columbia's liberty was thine.

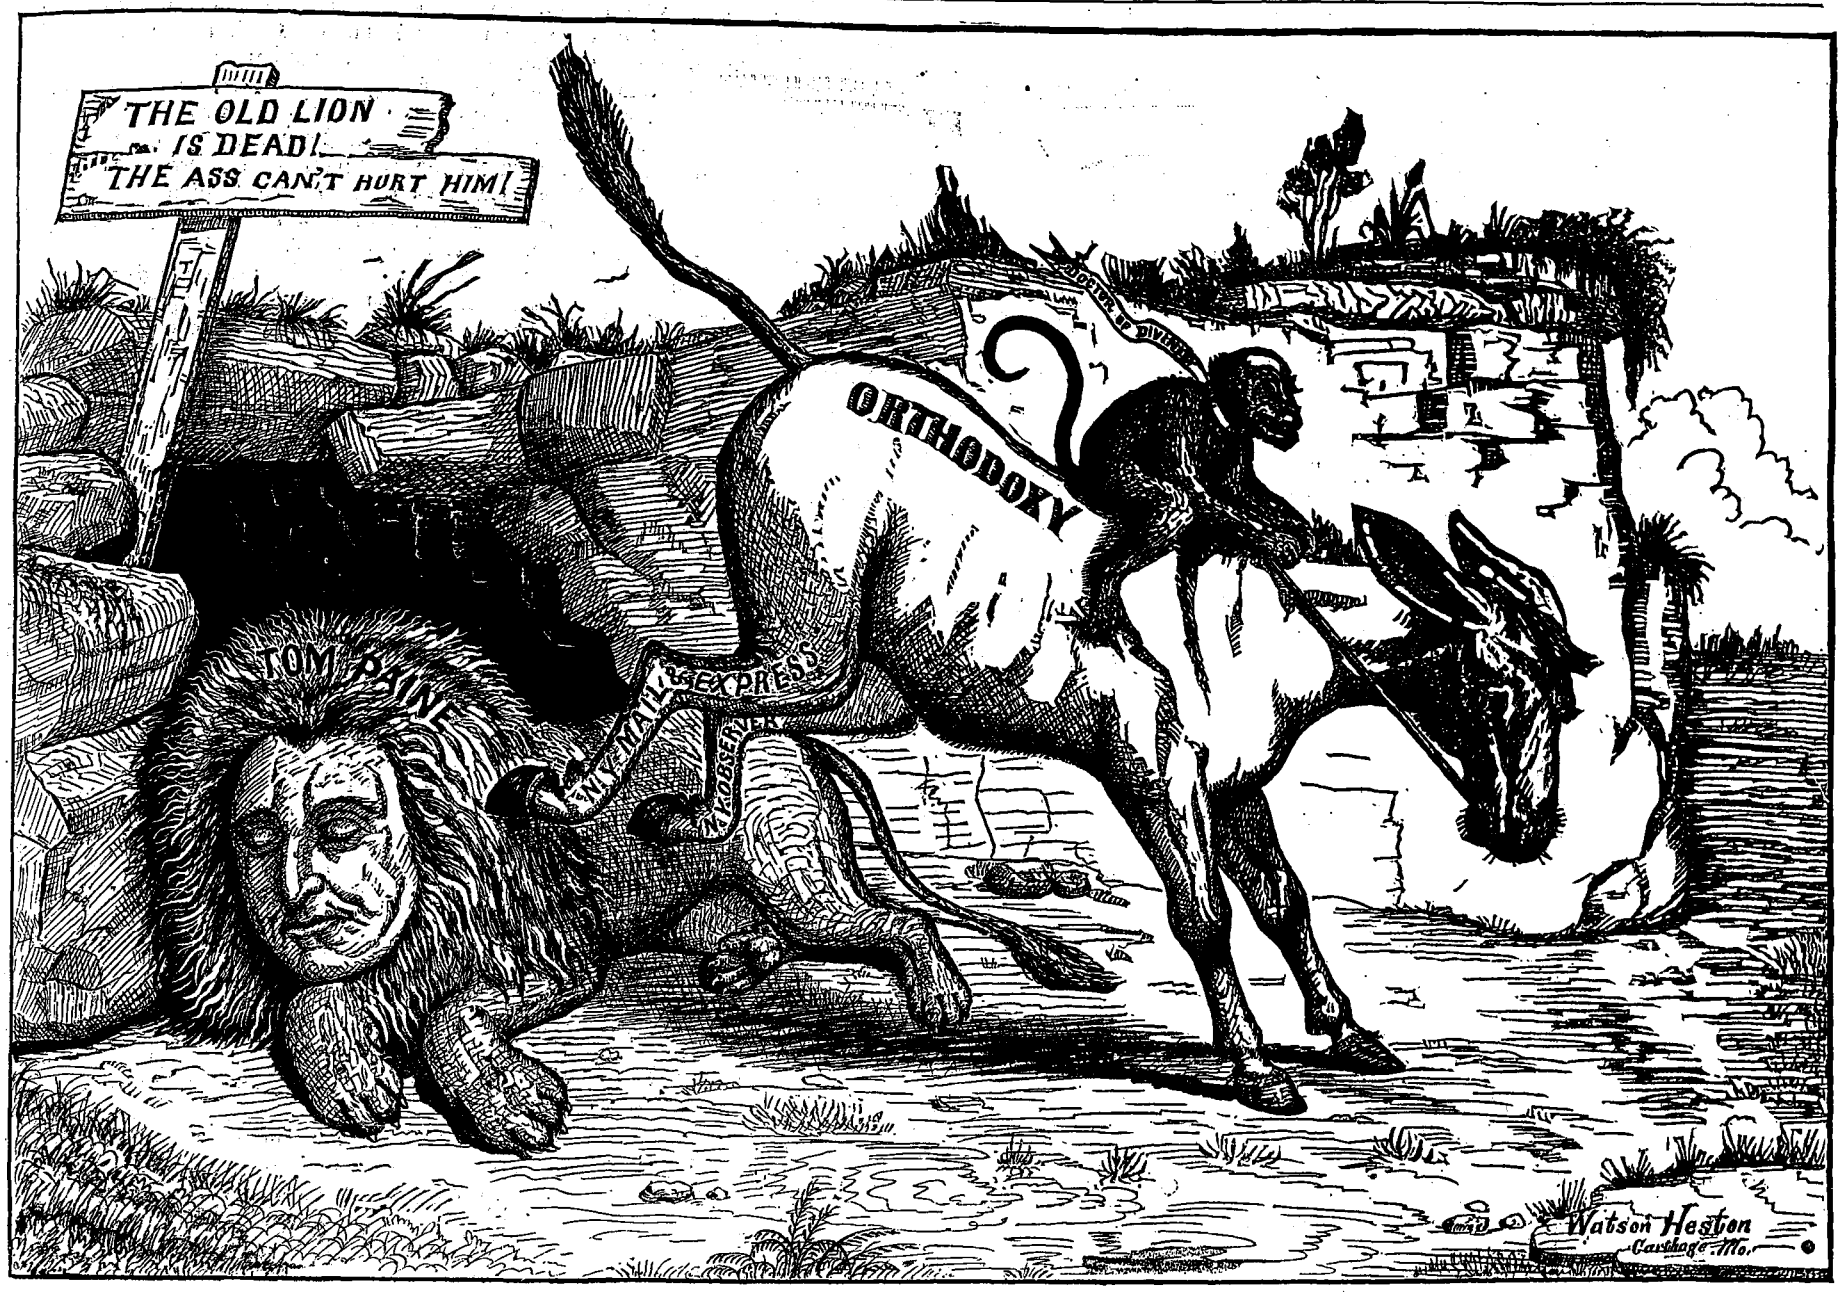
Ramsay,

A Contemporary of Paine, in "History of the Revolution," says of "Common Sense."

In union with the feelings and sentiments of the people, it produced surprising effects. Many thousands were convinced, and were led to approve and long for a separation from the mother country; though that measure, a few months before, was not only foreign to their wishes, but the object of their abhorrence, the current suddenly became so strong in its favor that it bore down all before it.

Charles Botta,



Italian Patriot and Historian. Fought for American Independence.

At this epoch appeared a writing entitled "Common Sense." It was the production of Mr. Thomas Paine, born in England, and arrived not long before in America. No writer, perhaps, ever possessed, in a higher degree, the art of moving and guiding the multitude at his will. It may be affirmed, in effect, that this work was one of the most powerful instruments of American independence.

Lord Edward Fitzgerald (Irish Patriot).

To his Mother, from Paris, 1792.

I lodge with my friend Paine; we breakfast, dine, and sup together. The more I see of his interior, the more I like and respect him. I cannot express how kind he has been to me; there is a simplicity of manner, a goodness of heart, and a strength of mind in him that I never knew a man before to possess.

A DONKEY KICKED A LION.

James Madison.

Should it finally appear that the merits of the man whose writings hav so much contributed to infuse and foster the spirit of independence in the people of America are unable to inspire them with a just beneficence, the world, it is feared, will giv us as little credit for our policy as for our gratitude in this particular.

Richard Henry Lee.

Thanking Washington for a copy of the "Rights of Man."

It is a performance of which any man might be proud; and I most sincerely regret that our country could not have offered sufficient inducements to hav retained, as a permanent citizen, a man so thoroughly republican in sentiment and fearless in the expression of his opinion.

Letter to Washington, 1794.

The very great respect I shall ever pay to your recommendations, would hav been very sufficient to hav procured my exertions in favor of Mr. Paine, independent of his great public merits in our Revolution. I hav a perfect knowledge of the extraordinary effects produced by that gentleman's writings; effects of such an important nature as would render it very unworthy of these States to let him suffer anywhere; but it would be culpable indeed to permit it under their own eye, and within their own limits. I had not the good fortune to be present when Mr. Paine's business was considered in the House of Delegates (of Virginia), or, most certainly, I should hav exerted myself in his behalf.

Sir Francis Burdett.

Speech in London, 1797.

Union! It is union among the people that ministers dread. They are aware that when once the people unite in demanding their rights, then there must be an end to illegitimate power; I mean all power not derived from the people. Ministers know that a united people are not to be resisted; and it is this that we must understand by what is written in the works of an honest man too long calumniated, I mean Thomas Paine.

Madame de Stael.

Thomas Paine was the most violent of the American democrats; and yet, there was neither calculation nor hypocrisy in his political exaggerations. When the sentence of Louis XVI. came under discussion, he alone advised what would hav done honor to France if it had been adopted, the offer to the king of an asylum in America. "The Americans are grateful to him," said Paine, "for having promoted their independence."

WHAT LATER WRITERS THINK.

From Thomas Paine's Time to Our Own Day.—He Needs No Monument.

Andrew Jackson.

In Conversation with Judge Hertell.

Thomas Paine needs no monument made by hands; he has erected himself a monument in the hearts of all lovers of liberty. "The Rights of Man" will be more enduring than all the piles of marble and granit man can erect.

Lord Erskine.

"The greatest forensic advocate since the days of Cicero," speaking of the American Revolution, said:

In that great and calamitous conflict, Edmund Burke and Thomas Paine fought in the same field together, but with very different success. Mr. Burke spoke to a Parliament in England, such as Sir George Saville describes it, having no ears but for sounds that flattered its corruptions. Mr. Paine, on the other hand, spoke to the people, reasoned with them, told them they were bound by no subjection to any sovereignty, further than their own benefit connected them; and by these powerful arguments prepared the minds of the American people for that glorious, just, and happy Revolution.

William Howitt.

In "Cassell's Illustrated History of England."

There was no man in the colonies, nevertheless, who contributed so much to bring the open Declaration of Independence to a crisis, as Thomas Paine, the celebrated author of "The Rights of Man," and the "Age of Reason." · · ·

This pamphlet [Common Sense] was the spark which was all that was needed to fire the train of Independence. It at once seized on the imagination of the public; cast all other writers into the shade, and flew in thousands and tens of thousands all over the colonies. · · · During the winter and spring, this lucid and admirably reasoned pamphlet was read and discussed everywhere, and by all classes, bringing the conviction that immediate independence was necessary. The common fire blazed up in the Congress, and the thing was done. · · · He [Paine] became the great oracle on subjects of governments and constitutions, and contrived, both by personal exertions and through the press, to urge on the utter separation of the colonies from the mother country.

William Massey.

In his "History of England."

Thomas Paine's pamphlet, "Common Sense," in which the new doctrins of liberty and equality were broadly taught, was published in America, in January, 1776, and had an immense circulation.

Judge Herttell.

No man in modern ages has done more to benefit mankind, or distinguished himself more for the immense moral good he has effected for his species, than Thomas Paine; who in truth merits eternal life, and doubtless will be immortalized in the memory and gratitude of future generations of happy beings, who will continue to hymn his praises and make his merits known to the remotest posterity.

Rev. Solomon Southwick.

Printer, Politician, and Lecturer against Infidelity.

No page in history, stained as it is with treachery and falsehood, or cold-blooded indifference to right or wrong, exhibits a more disgraceful instance of public ingratitude than that which Thomas Paine experienced from an age and country which he had so faithfully served. As the Tyrtæus of the Revolution, and it is no exaggeration to style him such, we owe everlasting gratitude to his name and memory. Why, then, was he suffered to sink into unmerited silence and obscurity, after having, in both hemispheres, so signally distinguished himself as the friend of liberty and mankind? Was his religion, or want of religion, the real or affected cause? Did not those who feared his talents make his religion a pretext not only to treat him with cold neglect, but to strip him, if possible, of every laurel he had won in the political field, as the brilliant, undaunted, and successful advocate of freedom? · · · A brief note is insufficient to do justice to so important a subject. We may, however, safely affirm that Paine's conduct in America was that of a real patriot. In the French Convention he displayed the same pure and disinterested spirit; there his humanity shone forth in his exertions to save, at the risk of his own life, the unfortunate Louis XVI. from the scaffold. · · · Had Thomas Paine been a Grecian or Roman patriot, in olden times, and performed the same public services as he did for this country, he would hav had the honor of an apotheosis. The Pantheon would hav been opened to him, and we should at this day regard his memory with the same veneration that we do that of Socrates and Cicero. But posterity will do him justice. Time, that destroys envy and establishes truth, will clothe his character in the habiliments that justly belong to it. · · · We cannot resist the disposition to say, that in suffering the home of the author of "Common Sense," "The Crisis," and "The Rights of Man," to lie neglected, in the first place; and, secondly, in permitting it to be violated, and his bones shipped off to a foreign country, contrary to all the laws of decency and civilization, we hav added nothing to the justice or dignity of our national character; and we shall rejoice if impartial history tax us not with a gross departure from both.

Mary Howitt.

In her "History of the United States."

Early in this year (1776) Thomas Paine, a recent emigrant to America, and editor of the Pennsylvania Magazine, published a pamphlet, called "Common Sense," which spoke at once the secret sentiment of the people. It went direct to the point, showing, in the simplest but strongest language, the folly of keeping up the British connection, and the absolute necessity which existed for separation. The cause of Independence took, as it were, a definit form from this moment.

Mary L. Booth.

In her "History of New York."

At this juncture "Common Sense" was published in Philadelphia by Thomas Paine, and electrified the whole nation with the spirit of Independence and Liberty. This eloquent production severed the last link that bound the colonies to the mother country; it boldly gave speech to the arguments which had long been trembling on the lips of many, but which none before had found courage to utter; and, accepting its conclusions, several of the colonies instructed their delegates, in the Continental Congress, to close their eyes against the ignis fatuus of loyalty, and fearlessly to throw off their allegiance to the crown.

Richard Hildreth.

In his "History of the United States."

No little excitement was produced by the publication, in Philadelphia, about this time (1776) of "Common Sense," a pamphlet by Thomas Paine. · · · It argued in that plain and convincing style, for which Paine was so distinguished, the folly of any longer attempting to keep up the British connection, and the absolute necessity of a final and formal separation. Pitched exactly to the popular tone, it had a wide circulation throughout the colonies, and gave a powerful impulse to the cause of Independence.

W. H. Bartlett.

In his "History of the United States of America."

It was at this critical period, while this feeling, though inoperativ, yet lingered in the minds of the people, and when, although the thing itself had become familiarized to most minds as equally necessary and desirable, every one held back from boldly pronouncing the word INDEPENDENCE, that there appeared a pamphlet called "Common Sense," written by Thomas Paine, the celebrated author of the "Rights of Man," who had recently emigrated from England, and ardently embraced the American cause. Perceiving the hesitation in the public mind, he set himself to the work of dissipating it by a clear and convincing statement of the actual position of affairs. He plainly exposed the impossibility of a lasting reconciliation with England, and showed that Independence had not only become the only safe or honorable course, but that it was as practicable as it was desirable. · · · This pamphlet, written in a popular and convincing style, and expressly adapted to the state of public feeling, produced an indescribable sensation. The ice was now broken; those who, although convinced, had hitherto held back, came boldly forward, while many who had halted between two opinions now yielded to the force of necessity and embraced the popular side.

Dr. John W. Francis.

No work had the demand for readers comparable to that of Paine. The "Age of Reason" on its first appearance in New York was printed as an orthodox book, by orthodox publishers, doubtless deceived by the vast renown which the author of "Common Sense" had obtained.

Benj. F. Lossing.

In "Field Book of the Revolution."

It ["Common Sense"] was the earliest and most powerful appeal in behalf of Independence, and probably did more to fix that idea firmly in the public mind than any other instrumentality. · · ·

The flame of desire for absolute independence glowed in every patriot bosom at the beginning of 1776, and the vigorous paragraphs of "Common Sense," and kindred publications, laboring with the voice of impassioned oratory at every public gathering of the people, uncapped the volcano. · · ·

Paine also wrote a series of political pamphlets called "The Crisis," which were admirably adapted to the state of the times, and which did much toward keeping alive the spirit of determined rebellion against the unjust government of Great Britain.

Atlantic Monthly, Vol. IV.

His (Paine's) career was wonderful, even for the age of miraculous events he lived in. In America he was a revolutionary hero of the first rank, who carried letters in his pocket from George Washington, thanking him for his services; and he managed besides to write his name in large letters in the history of England and France. · · ·

The Democratic movement of the last eighty years, be it a "finality" or only a phase of progress toward a more perfect state, is the grand historical fact of modern times, and Paine's name is intimately connected with it.

"The Analyst."

Putnam and Wiley, New York, 1840.

It is allowed by all liberal judges, that, in his "Common Sense" and "The Crisis," he strengthened in the American mind its aspirations after liberty; gave them the right direction, manfully exhorted them in their wavering hour; and acted the part of a freeman and an activ friend to humanity.

Henry G. Watson.

In his "History of the United States."

A pamphlet, entitled "Common Sense," written by Thomas Paine, arguing, in plain language, the advantage and necessity of Independence, effected a complete revolution in the feelings and sentiments of the great mass of the prople.

A Revival of Interest in Paine.

E. J. Edwards, in Press, Philadelphia.

When men now in middle life were young, it would hav been regarded as almost a blasphemous offense for them to read any of the writings of Tom Paine, and many persons who are in the prime of life can easily recall with what a shudder the name of Tom Paine was uttered, and with what awful warnings his writings were referred to. But we surely hav advanced marvelously, even within twenty years. Paine and his writings are now discussed at meetings of the church clubs and other associations of a semi-religious nature, and in one of the periodicals, the recognized organ of one of the greatest of religious denominations, there has just appeared a careful, fair and scholarly review of Paine and his works as recently published. There is something of commendation, too, for some of his views. The secular press has noticed at considerable length these publications, and there seems to be really something of a revival of interest in this remarkable man and his remarkable writings, as well as an understanding of the service which he did to the cause of the American Revolution.

Robert G. Ingersoll.

He had more brains than books; more sense than education; more courage than politeness; more strength than polish. He had no veneration for old mistakes—no admiration for ancient lies. He loved the truth for the truth's sake, and for man's sake. He saw oppression on every hand; injustice everywhere; hypocrisy at the altar, venality on the bench, tyranny on the throne; and with a splendid courage he espoused the cause of the weak against the strong—of the enslaved many against the titled few. · · ·

He had spent his life thus far in destroying the power of kings, and now he turned his attention to the priests. He knew that every abuse had been embalmed in scripture—that every outrage was in partnership with some holy text. He knew that the throne skulked behind the altar, and both behind a pretended revelation from God. By this time he had found that it was of little use to free the body and leave the mind in chains. He had explored the foundations of despotism, and had found them infinitly rotten. He had dug under the throne, and it occurred to him that he would take a look behind the altar.

The result of his investigations was given to the world in the "Age of Reason." From the moment of its publication he became infamous. He was calumniated beyond measure. To slander him was to secure the thanks of the church. All his services were instantly forgotten, disparaged or denied. He was shunned as though he had been a pestilence. Most of his old friends forsook him. He was regarded as a moral plague, and at the bare mention of his name the bloody hands of the church were raised in horror. He was denounced as the most despicable of men. · · ·

In Europe, Liberty was lying chained in the inquisition—her white bosom stained with blood. In the new world the Puritans had been hanging and burning in the name of God, and selling white Quaker children into slavery in the name of Christ, who said, "Suffer little children to come unto me."

Under such conditions progress was impossible. Some one had to lead the way. The church is, and always has been, incapable of a forward movement Religion always looks back. The church has already reduced Spain to a guitar, Italy to a hand-organ, and Ireland to exile.

Some one not connected with the church had to attack the monster that was eating out the heart of the world. Some one had to sacrifice himself for the good of all. The people were in the most abject slavery; their manhood had been taken from them by pomp, by pageantry and power. Progress is born of doubt and inquiry. The church never doubts—never inquires. To doubt is heresy—to inquire is to admit that you do not know—the church does neither.

More than a century ago Catholicism, wrapped in robes red with the innocent blood of millions, holding in her frantic clutch crowns and scepters, honors and gold, the keys of heaven and hell, trampling beneath her feet the liberties of nations, in the proud moment of almost universal dominion, felt within her heartless breast the deadly dagger of Voltaire. From that blow the church never can recover. Livid with hatred she launched her eternal anathema at the great destroyer, and ignorant Protestants hav echoed the curse of Rome.

In our country the Church was all-powerful, and although divided into many sects, would instantly unite to repel a common foe.

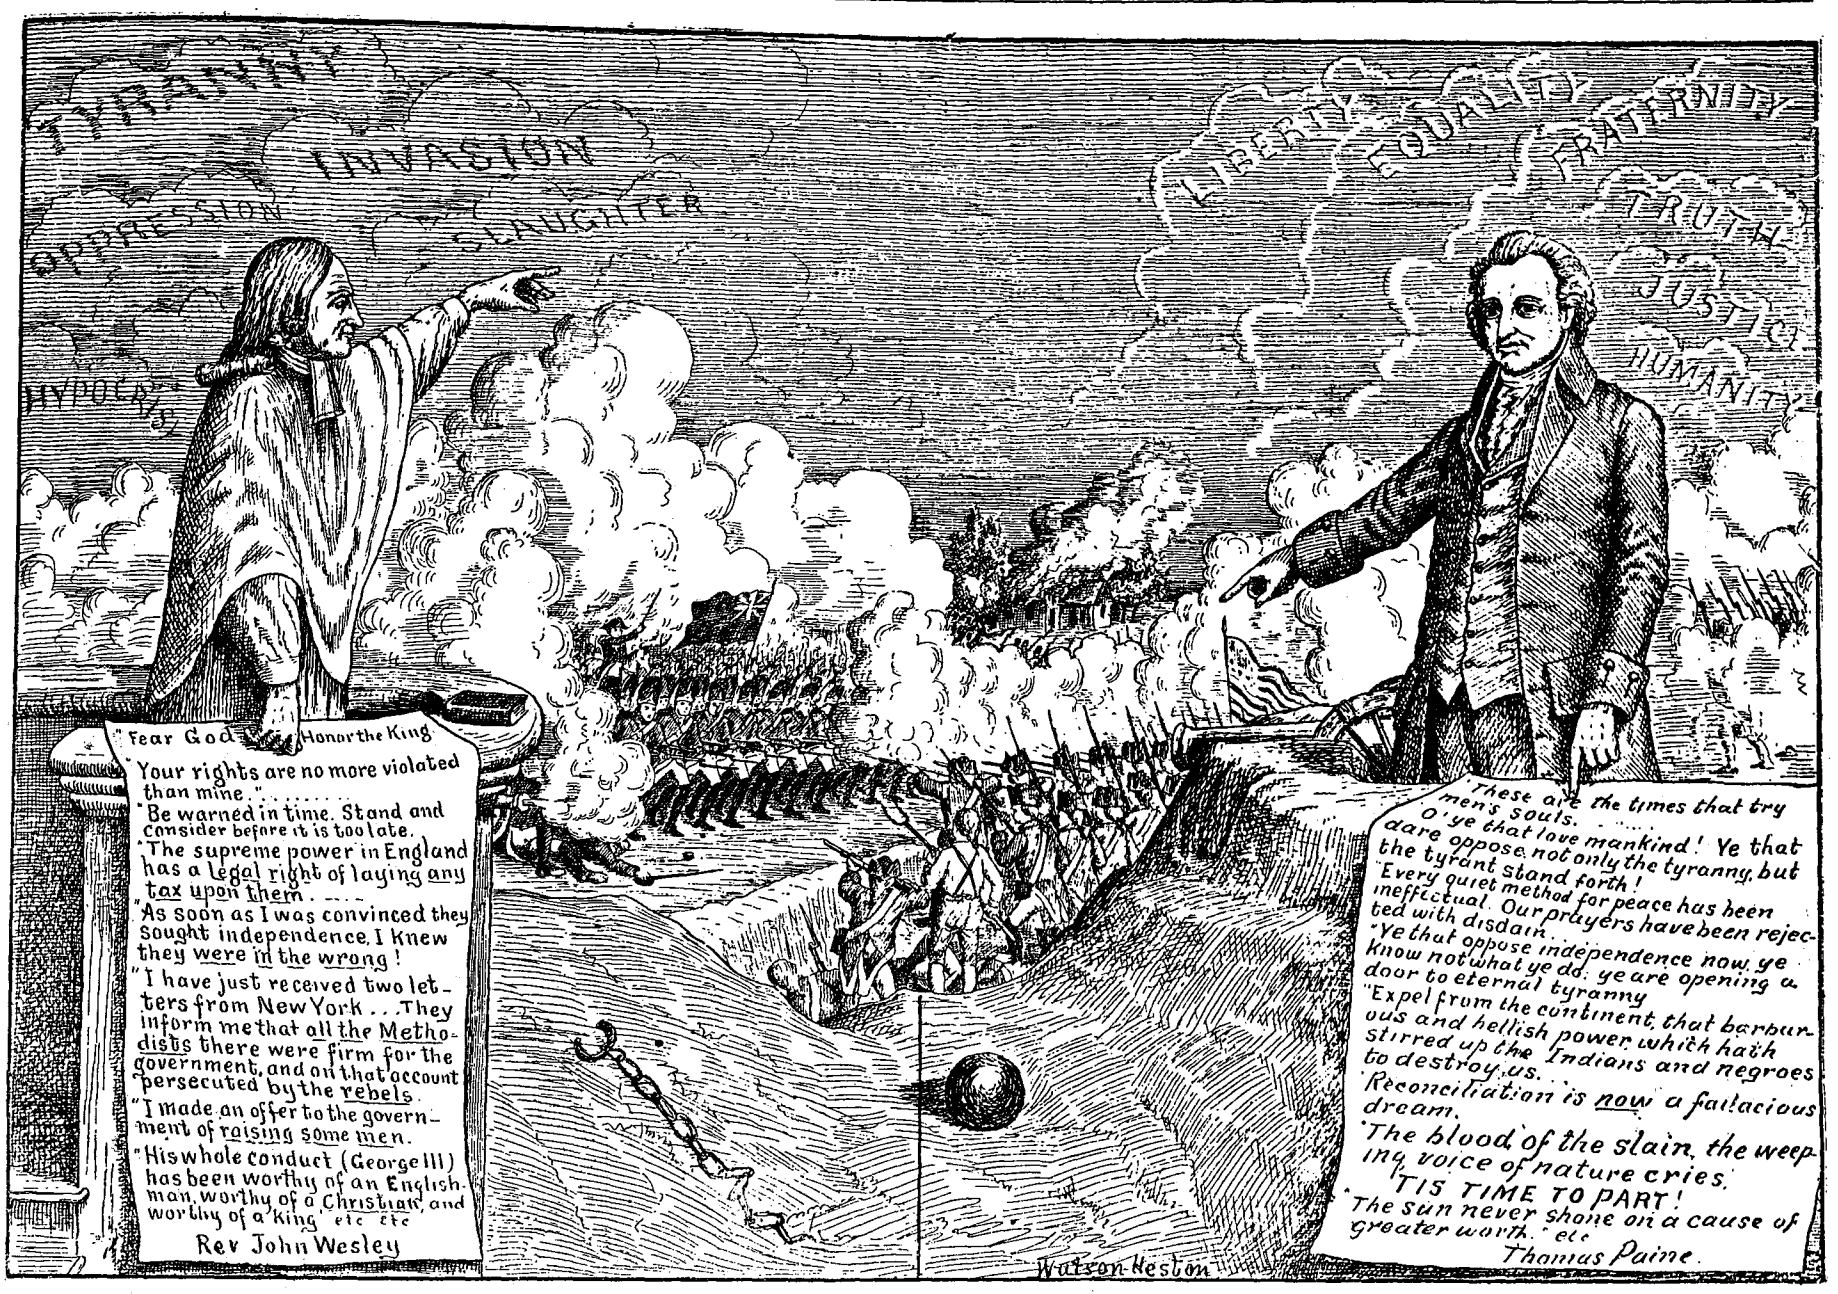
Paine struck the first grand blow.

The "Age of Reason" did more to undermine the power of the Protestant church than all other books then known. It furnished an immense amount of food for thought. It was written for the average mind, and is a straightforward, honest investigation of the Bible, and of the Christian system.

Paine did not falter from the first page to the last. He givs you his candid thought, and candid thoughts are always valuable.

The "Age of Reason" has liberalized us all. It put arguments in the mouths of the people; it put the church on the defensiv; it enabled somebody in every village to corner the parson; it made the world wiser, and the church better; it took power from the pulpit and divided it among the pews.

S. P. Putnam, "Four Hundred Years of Freethought."



Paine and the American Revolution.

But the French Revolution is not understood wholly until we understand Thomas Paine, in whom the soul of Voltaire seemed to find radiant manifestation. What a figure he presents amidst those surging elements, serene and confident as if used to such enormous strife. He never loses his equanimity, although death stares him in the face. He has no particle of fear. He is absolutely self-sacrificing. A plain, simple philosopher, "a stay-maker, unkempt," says Carlyle, and yet, within him, as in the depths of ocean, heaved immeasurable powers. In him was the unconquerable mind. Already had he won fame; already had he created a republic; already his pen had been wielded with the strength of a thunderbolt. He was greeted on French soil with the acclamations of the multitude. He became a member of the Convention—a resident of France. With unalterable devotion he labored for humanity. "Where liberty is not, there is my country," he said. In that we find the motiv of this sublime spirit. · · ·

It was one thing to ask for redress. It was another to create a revolution. It was one thing to petition, to get on one's knees before the throne, but quite another to defy that throne and fling forth the flag of irreconcilable rebellion. It was the critical moment. It was useless any longer to plead. The tide of public opinion must set one way or the other. There must be a change, or the conflict would end in submission. Far-seeing Franklin, and others, saw this, but were outwardly indecisiv. No puny hand could do this work, no common writer. It must he a master mind whoever did it. It must succeed at once, or disastrously fail. Who was the man of the hour? Who could, with almost one stroke of his pen, turn the people in a radically new direction? Who must exert an influence that had never, in any crisis of history, been exerted by one man before? The American Republic to-day, with its illimitable glory, its forty-four stars blazing on its banner, and belting a continent, can only reply: Thomas Paine!

Stephen Pearl Andrews.

The true chief-priest of humanity is the man who solves the greatest riddles and conquers the greatest obstacles in the progress of mankind; and you must not be surprised if I rank Thomas Paine not only, therefore, as a priest, but as perhaps the real chief-priest, or pontifex maximus, of his age.

Charles Bradlaugh.

Thomas Paine's name stands so high that any word of mine as testimony to his memory seems an impertinence. He was a sturdy, true man, though Norfolk-born not English, but human, and with nothing of geographical limit to that humanity. As a politician, or rather as a thinker on politics, he stands for England as Jean Jacques Rousseau has stood for France. You on your side ought to reverence him for his timely words in the great crisis which gave form and reality to vague, unspoken thought. We on our side, too, ought to honor him for the "Rights of Man" yet to be wearisomely achieved.

Elizur Wright.

In my early life I looked at Thomas Paine through the green spectacles of the orthodox popular religion. While I did so, the Revolution of '76 seemed supernatural, and our Republicanism mysterious. As years rolled on, I met a worthy Quaker abolitionist of New Rochelle, who gave me some traditional information of Paine's private character so flatly contradictory to the common Christian estimate. that I was excited to study his writings and public career as I had never done before. I was surprised to find there the natural cause of what before had been so mysterious to me. It became perfectly clear that it was Thomas Paine, more than any other man or any other thing, who turned the current of history in the New World. It was his clear head and brave and righteous soul that inspired the men who declared our independence, and put into the Constitution of the United States such a veto against ecclesiastical domination as has defied its proud and conceited usurpation to the present day.

Hon. George W. Julian.

I read Paine's political writings when a boy, and hav admired him ever since. He was a perfectly unselfish and incorruptible patriot; he was a philanthropist in the best sense of the word; he was a man of the rarest integrity and moral courage. If any man, nativ or foreign born, among the illustrious characters of "the times that tried men's souls," is to be singled out as the real Father of American Democracy, it is Thomas Paine. He has been the victim of almost infinit injustice; but I rejoice in the confident belief that time will fully vindicate his memory, and restore him to his just rank among the heroes of humanity.

Thomas Wentworth Higginson.

Thomas Paine, in the finest words that ever came from his lips, when he was urged by his friends to leave France during the French Revolution, gave us something that might be always the motto for us. They urged him (he was in personal danger) to go back to America, the country he had served so long. "Go there," they said, "it is your country." "No," he said; "for the time, this is my country." Then they quoted to him the old Latin motto that he himself had once quoted: "'Where liberty is, there is my country.' What grander motto can there be?" But Paine, with the doors of the Bastile opening before him, thought of one still grander. "No," he said, "no, it is not my motto—not 'Where liberty is, there is my country,' but 'Where liberty is not, there is my country.'" So said Thomas Paine, and the doors of the Bastile closed around him.

Theodore Parker.

His instincts were humane and elevated, and his life devoted mainly to the great purposes of humanity. I think he did more to promote piety and morality among man than a hundred ministers of that age in America.

Judge James P. Platt.

Paper read before "Sons of the American Revolution," 1894.

If Paine had not written the "Age of Reason," his name would to-day be linked with that of Washington as one of the most illustrious heroes in our victorious struggle for independence. It is not too much to say that, except for him, the struggle would not hav been victorious, and yet it is only within the last few years that a stone has been set to mark his last resting place. Such has been the force of religious intolerance and theological intimidation in a country whose constitution divorces church and state.

It is well worth our while to pause a moment and review such a life as his, and, as far as in us lies, do justice to one of the keenest minds and most vigorous intellects the world has ever known. It is to Benjamin Franklin that we are indebted in the first instance for the service which Paine rendered to this country. Early in life he was an exciseman in his nativ English town, and was chosen to go to London to lay before Parliament the needs of the excise service. There he met Franklin, and gained his confidence and esteem. Shortly after, he lost his government position on account what would, in the present enlightened era of civil service reform, be called "pernicious activity." Franklin then advised him to migrate to the new world across the sea and gave him letters to some of his influential and intimate friends in Philadelphia, where he became the editor of the Pennsylvania Magazine. . . . .

Hardly a progressiv thought to-day is free from the ideas which he embalmed in those magazine writings, and quotations from his pen would adorn the discussions at every symposium of reformers, had he not lost his popularity by looking to nature rather than to books for evidences of his God, and given to the world as his final effort of iconoclasm a blow at established religion.

George Lippard.

Ah, my friends! you may talk to me of the sublimity of your battles, whose poetry is bones and skulls, whose glories are like the trophies of the butcher's shambles; but for me there is no battle so awfully sublime as one like this, now being fought before your eyes.

A poor, neglected author, sitting in his garret—the world, poverty, time, space, all forgotten—as, with his soul kindled into one steady blaze, he plies that fast-moving quill That quill writes down words on paper which shall burn into the brains of kings—words like arrows winged with fire and pointed with vitrio!

In the full prime of early manhood, he joins the army of the Revolution; he shares the crust and the cold with Washington and his men; he is with those brave soldiers on the toilsome march, with them by the camp-fire, with th m in the hour of battle!

Is the day dark? has the battle been bloody? do the American soldiers despair? Hark! that printing-press yonder, which moves with the American camp in all its wanderings, is scattering pamphlets through the ranks of the army—pamphlets written by the author-soldier; written sometimes on the head of a drum, or by the midnight fire, or amid the corses of the dead.'

D. M. Bennett.

Among the great and good men who hav lived before our time, whose fame and reputation I envy, whose character I fain would emulate—prominent among them stands our moral hero, Thomas Paine, a bright, radiant star in the galaxy of Freethought, mental liberty, and love of the human race, whose effulgence will never be dimned, and whose clear light may be safely followed through all the years to come.

Rev. M. D. Conway.

Sermon at Cincinnati, 1860.

All efforts to stain the good name of Thomas Paine hav recoiled on those who made them, like poisoned arrows shot against a strong wind. . . .

In his life, in his justice, in his truth, in his adherence to high principles, in his disinterestedness, I look in vain for a parallel in those times and in these times. I am selecting my words. I know I am to be held accountable for them. So disinterested was he, that when his works were printed by the ten thousand, and as fast as one edition was out another was demanded, he, a poor and pinched author, who might very easily hav grown rich, would not accept one cent for them, declared that he would not coin his principles, and made to the states a present of the copyrights. His brain was his fortune—nay, his living; he gave it all to American Independence.

Robert G. Ingersoll.

Thomas Paine was one of the intellectual heroes—one of the men to whom we are indebted. His name is associated forever with the Great Republic. As long as free government exists he will be remembered, admired and honored.

He lived a long, laborious and useful life. The world is better for his having lived. For the sake of truth he accepted hatred and reproach for his portion. He ate the bitter bread of sorrow. His friends were untrue to him because he was true to himself, and true to them. He lost the respect of what is called society, but kept his own. His life is what the world calls failure and what history calls success.

If to love your fellow-men more than self is goodness, Thomas Paine was good.

If to be in advance of your time—to be a pioneer in the direction of right—is greatness, Thomas Paine was great.

If to avow your principles and discharge your duty in the presence of death is heroic, Thomas Paine was a hero.

At the age of seventy-three, death touched his tired heart. He died in the land his genius defended—under the flag he gave to the skies. Slander cannot touch him now—hatred cannot reach him more. He sleeps in the sanctuary of the tomb, beneath the quiet of the stars.

A few more years—a few more brave men—a few more rays of light, and mankind will venerate the memory of him who said:

"ANY SYSTEM OF RELIGION THAT SHOCKS THE MIND OF A CHILD CANNOT BE A TRUE SYSTEM;"

"THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY, AND TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION."

John E. Remsburg.

And now, gentle reader, in the face of all this evidence, do you still believe this man to hav been a fiend? And you, reverend sir, who hav assisted in perpetuating those base slanders, honestly believing them to be truths—will you still persist in publishing them to the world, or will you hav the manliness to say, as a Methodist clergyman once said, "Thomas Paine is the worst-slandered man that ever lived, and I hav ignorantly helped to slander him?" I hav sufficient confidence in your integrity to believe that you will do him justice.

But you, vile wretch! who, destitute of honor and incapable of shame, hav knowingly traduced this great man's character—you will continue to spit your venom, and go on. Yes, heartless monster! do your worst! Summon to your aid each hideous ally! Let Ignorance array her countless hosts; let the dark shades of Prejudice becloud the sky; let Hatred rave and curse; let the darts of Calumny strike thick and fast against the fair, white breast of Truth, and Slander clothe the tongues of all your minions! You strive in vain. The Crisis is past, the Age of Reason has dawned, Common Sense is fast taking the place of superstition, the Rights of Man are bound to triumph, and the author-hero's name will gather luster with each passing year. . . . The wrongs of Thomas Paine shall be avenged. In vain his country passed to him the bitter cup of sorrow; the fetters forged to chain his noble spirit to the dust, were forged for naught; loving lips whisper, "It still moves." Yes, onward moves the soul of Paine, and its resistless march is seen and felt on every side. Down through the future let it take its ceaseless course; and it, "reverberating through time like thunder through the sky, shall, in the distance far away, waken the slumbering ages."

Freethought and Paine.

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

This day is for the future; let us dream
Of what will be on time's far wandering stream,
Let us forget the limits we endure,
While glad to-morrows shall our hearts allure;
Let us behold the beauty and the light
That gild for us the distant mountain hight,
To which we labor with a mind elate,
Not for ourselvs, but for the world's estate.

Yes, Forward is our motto; and our song,
Press on against all ignorance and wrong,
Press on to knowledge and to joyous right,
To truth clear-eyed and unto action bright;
To science shining like the midday sun,
To ends of justice for the weakest one,
To paths of peace and wealth without alloy,
To perfect liberty's entrancing joy.

Yes, dream and sing amidst these flowers to-day,
For here we triumph over death's cold clay;
There is immortal glory in this hour,
In every kindled mind the thrill, the power
Which lifts above the darkness of the tomb,
Which makes this throbbing moment's gorgeous bloom
The bright interpreter of ages new,
With crowding ardors of prophetic view.
We are not slaves of fate, nor nature's sport,
Nor whim of God, nor minions of his court;
We are not static in time's endless roll,
Bv forces tossed which we cannot control;
We are dynamic—in ourselvs the will,
The passion, energy, and choice and skill,
To make a path amidst the mighty strife,
To build a paradise for human life.

For man is master, not a God on high,
And man the architect with wisdom's eye,
Selecting, planning, shaping, building vast
His own fair kingdoms which the gods outlast,
Himself the providence from dark to light,
Since first he walked the earth with form upright,
And from the forest's gloom emerged to roam
The shining fields and make abiding home.

Man fought with nature, fought a thousand foes,
Through thousand centuries he slowly rose,
With millions slain along his struggling path,
Defying storm and lightning—ocean's wrath,
Defying gods, the children of his brain,
Creating, slaying gods with every gain,
With knowledge making nature yield her best
From deepest chamber, and from mountain's crest,
From wave that in the golden sunshine leaps,
From star that scarcely on his vision sweeps,
Whose rays a million years must traverse space
To greet the ardor of his upward face.
Man now beholding these remotest gleams,
Dethrones the noblest god of all his dreams;
For in himself he sees the highest good,
Salvation only in his own swift blood,
His light-fed brain, and in his heart of fire,
Where never fear can quench his bright desire.
What mighty names adorn his lustrous course
To reason's kingdom from his savage force,
From cave forlorn to Parthenon sublime,
To songs as deathless as the pulse of time;
To arts magnificent and cities fair.
Rich fields that jewel summer's golden air,
The freighted river rhythmic with the swing
Of bannered ships and boats that forward spring,
With birdlike motion on the foaming path,
As if the dipping oar a spirit hath;
To ocean sounding with the tempest's rack—
The smoke-flag surging o'er the billowing track—
Man's proud defiance to the monstrous sea
Through which he plows to wealth and victory,
While 'neath the very thunder's crashing roar
The lightnings sing his word from shore to shore.

Thus man has pushed his way to empire wide,
By patient work and thousand ills defied,
Nor prayer, nor faith has aided his advance,
Nor trust in God, nor angel's wish or glance,
Nor anything save his own strenuous mind—
His thought, his will, his heart, his hand combined.

We praise the generations gone before,
The mighty dead lost in the mists of yore,
Forgotten, yet their life in our life glows;
Their life the root, our life the blooming rose;
They lived, they toiled, they loved, and somewhat gained;
Through immemorial years were hights attained;
Yes, praise the dead, the unknown mighty dead,
The millions silent in their royal bed,
Crowned now for us because we take from them,
By them made excellent life's precious gem,
More precious by the countless graves of earth,
Since death makes beautiful as well as birth.

And some we know among the mighty dead,
Like tall trees in the forest level spread,
Which shoot in emerald glory far aloft,
And catch the sunburst in the azure soft,
Or like the mountain swelling from the plain
With scenes majestic, from sweet summer's reign,
In flower and grove about the ample base,
To cliffs that beetle o'er some valley's face,
Which nestles in the fastness like a rose,
While soaring skyward are the eternal snows;
Or like a star that some lone space doth climb,
A flame of wonder on its course sublime,
Or like those stars that cluster in the sky
With rival radiance on the watcher's eye;
Thus lofty minds from age to age arise,
Enriching time with charm that never dies,
So that within the mind of man is rayed
A world more brilliant than by earth displayed,
More beautiful than day with broadening light,
Or constellated grandeurs of the night.

Man's spirit is for man the fountain high,
Of hope, of action; man must man supply,
With wisdom, courage, purpose, virtue, strength,
And man through man will reach his heaven at length;
Not heaven above with cold white throne of God,
And angels bowing to his awful rod,
Not heaven contrasted with the realms of woe,
And millions tossing on the fires below;
Not heaven where slavish worship rolls its song,
And not one thought is free in all the throng;
Where love and sympathy are banished quite,
And simply to be saved is one's delight;
Nor hope for others, nor the joy profound,
To lessen suffering wherever found;
Not for the world to-day a heaven like this—
But heaven of work and worth and human bliss;
A heaven we make, which is our action's zest;
No God nor Christ, but still our level best;
A heaven for all on this green earth of ours;
A heaven of music, laughter, sunshine, flowers;
A heaven of genius and of freedom's light;
A heaven whose glory is the fireside bright.
Not lofty throne, or angel's harp and wing,
But just the common good of everything.
There is no heaven where liberty is not;
Through ages dark this battle has been fought;
To make man free has been the glowing aim
Of millions slaughtered by the sword and flame.
Ah, what a struggle through the night of years
With agony, despair, and blood and tears;
Defeat and victory and gain and loss,
The gallows, dungeon, sepulchre, and cross;
The smoke of battle and the weary march,
To tardy promis of the morning's arch;
And liberty has triumphed—glorious power!
She wears the palm, upon her brow the flower,
Of thousand victories to this broad day,
When kings are dust and people hold the sway;
When labor is the master of the world,
And crowns, like baubles, are to ruin hurled;
Man universal—peasant and not king—
Is what the poets of the present sing;
Not man enthroned and partial in his pride,
Belittled by the pomps that virtue hide,
But man as man in nativ honor clad
And crowned by deeds—not what his fathers had.
His robes of royalty are purple now
With stains of toil, and on his beaded brow
The only jewels of his empire fair
Betoken him a worker everywhere.

Not yet has freedom won its noblest hight;
Not yet are swept away the fogs of night;
Not yet has knowledge gemmed with fairest fruit
The tree of life; not yet are forces brute
By reason ruled; nor yet hath wisdom's hand
Unveiled the treasures of the sea and land;
Nor yet is truth the monarch of the mind,
With genius, art, and beauty unconfined.

Immortal Paine! to thee our offerings pour,
Who first along Columbia's waiting shore
Didst set the stars that in our pennon bright
Full flash the radiance of rejoicing light;
And "Common Sense" shall be our motto still
To break the chains and noble hope instil.
Paine is not dead, although his bones may lie
Without an epitaph 'neath distant sky;
He livs in all our hearts, unseen yet grand,
Resplendent in the glory of this land.

Straight 'gainst the forehead of defiant wrong
His spear was hurled like comet's course along.
He sought no blessing, and he shunned no ban,
Determined solely for the "Rights of Man;"
And man not only from the king released,
But from the deeper tyranny of priest—
The tyranny that crushes not alone
The toiling flesh to build a bloody throne,
But crushes heart, hope, soul, and spirit, all,
And wraps the world in one tremendous pall,
So that no star will shine, no flower will blow,
No music whisper, and no fountain flow.
Dead, dead, the world without the world within;
The universe a waste of death and sin,
Which God is cursing with an angry frown,
So fierce that his own offspring must come down
And perish on the cross with blood and gloom
And sink into the darkness of the tomb;
Ah! sink to hell with cry of wild despair,
And suffer every torment soul can bear,
To save not all, but save a scanty few—
One in a million for God's grace will do.
The wisest, brightest hav no chance at all,
For virtue cannot win nor reason's call;
But simply faith—blind, cruel, coward faith,
Of genius, liberty, and love the death.
Against this foe colossal of the mind,
Which filled the earth with every crime combined,
The hero of America and France,
Through prison doors flung his far-shining lance;
So quick, so true, so mighty was the blow,
Like wounded serpents hissed the priests laid low;
And ever since they've hissed and crawled and stung
Their own vile haunts and pools of slime among;
But not again upon time's forward flood
Will they reign over man with fire and blood;
Their doom is sealed, the age of faith declines,
And brightening o'er the "Age of Reason" shines.

Bring all the splendors of the spring-time here,
A monument of glory let appear,
Green leaves and flowers and golden letters fair,
To greet the sunshine in this lucid air.
So let the music of our hearts break forth
In bright remembrance of this hero's worth.
Let us be comrades true and comrades brave,
And gather courage from the laureled grave;
For death shall not with lifeless gloom oppress,
We'll star it ever with sweet loveliness;
We'll make the virtues of the dead shine on
From depths of time to every golden dawn,
And they shall make us better and more strong,
While beauteous hope shall gleam our way along.
We can be free and fearless; we can strive;
We to the future some new fact can giv;
We can bear on the glory of the past
In thought and deed where'er our lot is cast;
We can be faithful, even if alone;
Some bright ideal still can be our own;
We can look forward and we can do right,
And dream of morning through the darkest night.

"COMMON SENSE."

The sun never shone on a cause of greater worth. 'Tis not the affair of a city, a county, a province, or a kingdom, but of a continent—of at least one-eighth part of the habitable globe. 'Tis not the concern of a day, a year, or an age; posterity are virtually involved in the contest, and will be more or less affected, even to the end of time, by the proceedings now.

In no instance hath Nature made the satellite larger than its primary planet; and as England and America, with respect to each other, reverse the common order of Nature, it is evident that they belong to different systems —England to Europe, America to itself.

"But Britain is the parent country," say some. Then the more shame upon her conduct. Even brutes do nor devour their young, nor savages make war upon their families.

The independence of America should hav been considered as dating its era from, and published by, the first musket that was fired against her.

Oh, ye that love mankind! Ye that dare oppose, not only the tyranny, but the tyrant, stand forth! Every spot of the old world is overrun with oppression. Freedom hath been hunted round the globe. Asia and Africa hav long expelled her. Europe regards her like a stranger, and England hath given her warning to depart. Oh, receive the fugitiv, and prepare in time an asylum for mankind.

"THE CRISIS."

These are the times that try men's souls. The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of his country; but he that stands it now deserves the love and thanks of man and woman. Tyranny, like hell, is not easily conquered; yet we hav this consolation with us, that the harder the conflict the more glorious the triumph.

The heart that feels not now is dead; the blood of his children will curse his cowardice who shrinks back at a time when a little might hav saved the whole and made them happy. I love the man that can smile in trouble, that can gather strength from distress, and grow brave by reflection. 'Tis the business of little minds to shrink; but he whose heart is firm, and whose conscience approves his conduct, will pursue his principles unto death.

He that rebels against reason is a real rebel.

To argue with a man who has renounced the use and authority of reason, and whose philosophy consists in holding humanity in contempt, is like administering medicin to the dead.

The poor reflection of having served your king will yield you no consolation in your parting moments. He will crumble to the same undistinguished ashes with yourself, and hav sins enough of his own to answer for. It is not the farcical benedictions of a bishop, nor the cringing hypocrisy of a court of chaplains, nor the formality of an act of parliament, that can change guilt into innocence, or make the punishment one pang the less.

There are cases in which it is as impossible to restore character to life as it is to recover the dead. It is a phœnix that can expire but once, and from whose ashes there is no resurrection.

It was not Newton's honor, neither could it be his pride, that he was born an Englishman, but that he was a philosopher. The heavens had liberated him from the prejudices of an island, and science had expanded his soul, as boundless as his studies.

"THE AGE OF REASON."

I do not believe in the creed professed by the Jewish Church, by the Roman Church, by the Greek Church, by the Turkish Church, by the Protestant Church. My own mind is my own church.

I hav always strenuously supported the right of every man to his opinion, however different that opinion might be to mine. He who denies to another this, makes a slave of himself to his present opinion, because he precludes himself the right of changing it.

The most formidable weapon against errors of every kind is Reason. I hav never used any other, and I trust I never shall.

When it is revealed to me, I will believe it to be a revelation; but it is not, and cannot be incumbent upon me to believe it to be a revelation before; neither is it proper that I should take the word of a man as the word of God, and put man in the place of God.

Some Christians pretend that Christianity was not established by the sword; but of what period of time do they speak? It was impossible that twelve men could begin with the sword; they had not the power; but no sooner were the professors of Christianity sufficiently powerful to employ the sword, than they did so, and the stake and fagot, too; and Mahomet could not do it sooner. By the same spirit that Peter cut off the ear of the high priest's servant (if the story be true) he would hav cut off his head, and the head of his master, had he been able. Besides this, Christianity grounds itself originally upon the Bible, and the Bible was established altogether by the sword, and that in the worst use of it; not to terrify, but to extirpate. The Jews made no converts; they butchered all. The Bible is the sire of the Testament, and both are called the word of God. The Christians read both books; the ministers preach from both books; and this thing called Christianity is made up of both. It is then false to say that Christianity was not established by the sword.

Loving enemies, is another dogma of feigned morality, and has besides no meaning. It is incumbent on man, as a moralist, that he does not revenge an injury; and it is equally as good in a political sense, for there is no end to retaliation; each retaliates on the other and calls it justice, but to love in proportion to the injury, if it could be done, would be to offer a premium for crime. Besides, the word enemies is too vague and general to be used in a moral maxim, which ought always to be clear and defined, like a proverb. If a man be the enemy of another from mistake and prejudice, as in the case of religious opinions, and sometimes in politics, that man is different to an enemy at heart with a criminal intention; and it is incumbent upon us, and it contributes also to our own tranquillity, that we put the best construction upon a thing that it will bear. But even this erroneous motiv in him makes no motiv for love on the other part; and to say that we can love voluntarily and without a motiv is morally and physically impossible.

Those who preach this doctrin of loving their enemies are in general the greatest persecutors, and they act consistently by so doing; for the doctrin is hypocritical, and it is natural that hypocrisy should act the reverse of what it preaches. For my own part I disown the doctrin, and consider it as a feigned or fabulous morality; yet the man does not exist that can say I hav persecuted him, or any man or any set of men, either in the American Revolution, or in the French Revolution; or that I hav, in any case, returned evil for evil. But it is not incumbent on man to reward a bad action with a good one, or to return good for evil; and wherever it is done, it is a voluntary act, and not a duty.

Of all the systems of religion that ever were invented, there is none more derogatory to the Almighty, more unedifying to man, more repugnant to reason, and more contradictory in itself, than this thing called Christianity. Too absurd for belief, too impossible to convince, and too inconsistent for practice, it renders the heart torpid, or produces only Atheists and fanatics. As an engin of power, it serves the purpose of despotism; and as a means of wealth, the avarice of priests; but so far as respects the good of man in general, it leads to nothing here or hereafter.

The Bible-makers hav undertaken to giv us, in the first chapter of Genesis, an account of the creation; and in doing this they hav demonstrated nothing but their ignorance. They make there to hav been three days and three nights, evenings and mornings, before there was a sun; when it is the presence or absence of a sun that is the cause of day and night—and what is called his rising and setting, that of morning and evening. Besides, it is a pueril and pitiful idea, to suppose the Almighty to say, "Let there be light." It is the imperativ manner of speaking that a conjurer uses when he says to his cups and balls, Presto, be gone—and most probably has been taken from it, as Moses and his rod are a conjurer and his wand. Longinus calls this expression the sublime; and by the same rule the conjurer is sublime too; for the manner of speaking is expressivly and grammatically the same. When authors and critics talk of the sublime, they see not how nearly it borders on the ridiculous. The sublime of the critics, like some parts of Edmund Burke's sublime and beautiful, is like a wind-mill just visible in a fog, which imagination might distort into a flying mountain, or an archangel, or a flock of wild geese.

"EXAMINATION OF THE PROPHECIES."

Now observe, reader, how the promulgation of this pretended salvation by a knowledge of and a belief in Jesus Christ went on, compared with the work of creation. In the first place, it took longer time to make a child than to make the world, for nine months were passed away and totally lost in a state of pregnancy; which is more than forty times longer time than God employed in making the world, according to the Bible account. Secondly, several years of Christ's life were lost in a state of human infancy. But the universe was in maturity the moment it existed. Thirdly, Christ, as Luke asserts, was thirty years old before he began to preach what they call his mission. Millions of souls died in the mean time without knowing it. Fourthly, it was above three hundred years from that time before the book called the New Testament was compiled into a written copy, before which time there was no such book. Fifthly, it was above a thousand years after that, before it could be circulated; because neither Jesus nor his apostles had knowledge of or were inspired with the art of printing; and, consequently, as the means for making it universally known did not exist, the means were not equal to the end, and, therefore, it is not the work of God.

"THE RIGHTS OF MAN."

I am contending for the right of the living, and against their being willed away, and controled and contracted for by the manuscript-assumed authority of the dead; and Mr. Burke is contending for the authority of the dead over the rights and freedom of the living.

Those who hav quitted the world, and those who are not arrived yet in it, are as remote from each other as the utmost stretch of mortal imagination can conceive. What possible obligation, then, can exist between them? What rule or principle can be laid down that two nonentities, the one out of existence and the other not yet in it, and who can never meet in this world, that the one should control the other to the end of time.

The circumstances of the world are continually changing, and the opinions of men change also; and as government is for the living and not for the dead, it is the living only that hav any right in it. That which may be thought right and found convenient in one age, may be thought wrong and found inconvenient in another. In such cases who is to decide—the living or the dead?

The greatest characters the world has known hav risen on the democratic floor. Aristocracy has not been able to keep a proportionate pace with democracy. The artificial noble shrinks into a dwarf beside the noble of nature.

Such is the irresistible nature of truth that all it asks, and all it wants, is the liberty of appearing. The sun needs no inscription to distinguish him from darkness.

When, in countries that are called civilized, we see age going to the workhouse, and youth to the gallows, something must be wrong in the system of government.

When it shall be said in any country in the world, "My poor are happy; neither ignorance nor distress is to be found among them; my jails are empty of prisoners, my streets of beggars; the aged are not in want, the taxes are not oppressiv; the rational world is my friend, because I am the friend of its happiness"—when these things can be said, then may that country boast of its constitution and its government.

A HINT FOR OUR PRESIDENTS AND GOVERNORS.

From a Letter of Paine to President Jefferson.

It has been customary in a President's discourse to say something about religion. I offer you a thought on this subject. The word, religion, used as a word en masse has no application to a country like America. In Catholic countries it would mean exclusivly the religion of the Romish church; with the Jews the Jewish religion; in England, the Protestant religion or in the sense of the English church, the established religion; with the Deists it would mean Deism; with the Turks, Mahometism, etc., etc. As well as I recollect it is Lego, Relego, Relegio, Religion. that is say, tied or bound by an oath or obligation. The French use the word properly; when a woman enters a convent, she is called a novitiate; when she takes the oath, she is a religeuse, that is, she is bound by an oath. Now all that we hav to do, as a Government, with the word religion, in this country, is with the civil rights of it, and not at all with its creeds. Instead therefore of usiug the word religion, as a word en masse, as if it meant a creed, it would be better to speak only of its civil rights; that all denominations of religion are equally protected, that none are dominant, none inferior, that the rights of conscience are equal to every denomination and to every individual and that it is the duty of government to preserve this equality of conscientious rights. A man cannot be called a hypocrit for defending the civil rights of religion, but he may be suspected of insincerity in defending its creeds.

"OF SOCIETY AND CIVILIZATION."

A great part of that order which reigns among mankind is not the effect of government. It had its origin in the principles of society, and the natural constitution of man. It existed prior to government, and would exist if the formality of government was abolished. The mutual dependence and reciprocal interest which man has in man, and all the parts of a civilized community upon each other, create that great chain of connection which holds it together. The landholder, the farmer, the manufacturer, the merchant, the tradesman, and every occupation prospers by the aid which each receives from the other, and from the whole. Common interest regulates their concerns, and forms their laws; and the laws which common usage ordains hav a greater influence than the laws of government. In fine, society performs for itself almost everything which is ascribed to government.

To understand the nature and quantity of government proper for man, it is necessary to attend to his character. As nature created him for social life, she fitted him for the station she intended. In all cases she made his natural wants greater than his individual powers. No one man is capable, without the aid of society, of supplying his own wants; and those wants, acting upon every individual, impel the whole of them into society, as naturally as gravitation acts to a center.

But she has gone further. She has not only forced man into society by a diversity of wants, which the reciprocal aid of each other can supply, but she has implanted in him a system of social affections, which, though not necessary to his existence, are essential to his happiness. There is no period in life when this love for society ceases to act. It begins and ends with our being.

If we examin, with attention, into the composition and constitution of man, the diversity of talents in different men for reciprocally accommodating the wants of each other, his propensity to society, and consequently to preserve the advantages resulting from it, we shall easily discover that a great part of what is called government is mere imposition.

Government is no further necessary than to supply the few cases to which society and civilization are not conveniently competent; and instances are not wanting to show that everything which government can usefully add thereto, has been performed by the common consent of society, without government.

For upwards of two years from the commencement of the American war, and a longer period in several of the American states, there were no established forms of government. The old governments had been abolished, and the country was too much occupied in defense to employ its attention in establishing new governments; yet, during this interval, order and harmony were preserved as inviolate as in any country in Europe. There is a natural aptness in man, and more so in society, because it embraces a greater variety of abilities and resources, to accommodate itself to whatever situation it is in. The instant formal government is abolished, society begins to act. A general association takes place, and common interest produces common security.

So far is it from being true, as has been pretended, that the abolition of any formal government is the dissolution of society, it acts by a contrary impulse, and brings the latter the closer together. All that part of its organization which it had committed to its government, devolves again upon itself, and acts through its medium. When men, as well from natural instinct as from reciprocal benefits, hav habituated themselvs to social and civilized life, there is always enough of its principles in practice to carry them through any changes they may find necessary or convenient to make in their government. In short, man is so naturally a creature of society, that it is almost impossible to put him out of it.

Formal government makes but a small part of civilized life; and when even the best that human wisdom can devise is established, it is thing more in name and idea than in fact. It is to the great and fundamental principles of society and civilization—to the common usage universally consented to, and mutually and reciprocally maintained—to the unceasing circulation of interest, which, passing through its innumerable channels, invigorates the whole mass of civilized man—it is to these things, infinitly more than anything which even the best instituted government can perform, that the safety and prosperity of the individual and of the whole depends.

The more perfect civilization is, the less occasion has it for government, because the more does it regulate its own affairs, and govern itself; but so contrary is the practice of old governments to the reason of the case, that the expenses of them increase in the proportion they ought to diminish. It is but few general laws that civilized life requires, and those of such common usefulness that whether they are enforced by the forms of government or not, the effect will be nearly the same. If we consider what the principles are that first condense men into society, and what the motivs that regulate their mutual intercourse afterwards, we shall find, by the time we arrive at what is called government, that nearly the whole of the business is performed by the natural operation of the parts upon each other.

Man, with respect to all those matters, is more a creature of consistency than he is aware of, or than governments would wish him to believe. All the great laws of society are laws of nature. Those of trade and commerce, whether with respect to the intercourse of individuals, or of nations, are laws of mutual and reciprocal interest. They are followed and obeyed, because it is the interest of the parties so to do, and not on account of any formal laws their government may impose or interpose.

But how often is the natural propensity to society disturbed or destroyed by the operations of government! When the latter, instead of being engrafted on the principles of the former, assumes to exist for itself, and acts by partialities of favor and oppression, it becomes the cause of the mischiefs it ought to prevent.

Some Significant Declarations.

MANCHESTER RESOLUTIONS.

At a meeting of the Manchester Constitutional Society, held this day, it was unanimously

Resolved, That the thanks of this socity are due to Mr. Thomas Paine for the publication of his "Second Part of 'The Rights of Man,' combining Principle and Practice"—a work of the highest importance to every nation under heaven, but particularly to this, as containing excellent and practical plans for an immediate and considerable reduction of the public expenditure; for the prevention of wars; for the extension of our manufactures and commerce; for the education of the young; for the comfortable support of the aged; for the better maintenance of the poor of every description; and, finally, for lessening greatly, and without delay, the enormous load of taxes under which this country at present labors

That this society congratulate their countrymen at large on the influence which Mr. Paine's publications appear to hav had in procuring the repeal of some oppressiv taxes in the present session of Parliament; and they hope that this adoption of a small part of Mr. Paine's ideas will be followed by the most strennous exertions to accomplish a complete reform in the present inadequate state of the representation of the people; and that the other great plans of public benefit, which Mr. Paine has so powerfully recommeded, will be speedily carried into effect.

THOMAS WALKER, President.
March 13, 1792, SAMUEL JACKSON, Secretary.

SHEFFIELD RESOLUTIONS.

This society (Sheffield Societv for Constitutional Information), composed chiefly of the manufacturers of Sheffield, began about four months ago, and is already increased to nearly two thousand members, and is daily increasing, exclusiv of the adjacent towns and villages who are forming themselvs into similar societies.

Considering, as we do, that the want of knowledge and information, in the general mass of the people, has exposed them to numberless impositions and abuses, the exertions of this society are directed to the acquirement of useful knowledge, and to spread the same as far as our endeavors and abilities can extend.

We declare that we hav derived more true knowledge from the two works of Thomas Paine, entitled "Rights of Man," Parts the First and Second, than from any [other] author on the subject. The practice as well as the principle of government is laid down in those works, in a manner so clear and irresistibly convincing, that this Society do hereby resolve to giv their thanks to Mr. Paine for his two publications, entitled "Rights of Man," Parts First and Second.

Resolved unanimously, That the thanks of this Society be given to Mr. Paine for the affectionate concern he has shown in his second work in behalf of the poor, the infant, and the aged, who, notwithstanding the opulence which blesses other parts of the community, are, by the grievous weight of taxes, rendered the miserable victims of povertv and wretchedness. . . .

March 14, 1792. DAVID MARTIN, Chairman.

ACT OF PENNSYLVANIA GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

Whereas, during the late Revolution, and particularly in the most trving and perilous times thereof, many very eminent services were rendered to the people of the United States by Thomas Paine, Esq., accompanied with sundry distinguished instances of fidelity, patriotism, and disinterestedness;

And whereas, the said Thomas Paine did, during the whole progress of the Revolution, voluntarily devote himself to the service of the public, without accepting recompense therefor. and, moreover, did decline taking or receiving the profits which authors are entitled to on the sale of their literary works. but relinquished them for the better accommodation of the country, and for the honor of the public cause.

And whereas, besides the knowledge which the House has of the services of the said Thomas Paine, the same having been recommended to us by his excellency the President and the Supreme Executiv Council of the State, of the 16th of December last past, and by the friendly offices of the late patriotic commander-in-chief, General Washington;

Be it enacted, and it is hereby enacted, by the Representativs of the freemen of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in general assembly met, and by the authority of the same, that, as a temporary recompense to the said Thomas Paine. and until suitable provision shall be further made, either federally by Congress or otherwise, the supreme executiv council be authorized and empowered to draw on the treasurer of this state for the sum of £500 in favor of and payable to the said Thomas Paine.

JOHN BAYARD, Speaker.

RESOLUTIONS OF UNITED STATES CONGRESS.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is sent for one year, with a copy of Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," for $6.50. If your cash order reaches us before the last form of the book goes to press, your name will be engrossed on its pages among those of the elect of Freethought.

Helen H. Gardener's latest novel, "An Unofficial Patriot," is now ready for delivery. It is the best work of the kind that Miss Gardener has written, and should hav an unprecedentedly large sale. Price, in cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents. We hav also just received a supply of the only complete and authorized edition of "The Great Ingersoll Controversy." It contains the famous Christmas sermon of Colonel Ingersoll, the protests of ministers of various denominations, and the orator's replies thereto. Price, 25 cents. "What Must We Do to be Saved?" can now be supplied in German at 25 cents per copy.

"Church Property" is now ready, and all accumulated orders hav been filled. The members of the Constitutional Convention and the press of New York will, of course, be supplied gratis. We shall also put as many copies as possible into the hands of other persons who hav influence to secure justice in taxation. How many copies are thus distributed will depend upon the assistance we receive from the working Liberals of the country. All Freethinkers who can should also buy "Church Property," and distribute it among their own lawmakers, editors, and thoughtful private citizens. We hav made the price very low for so large a pamphlet. Fifteen cents per single copy, ten copies for $1; fifty copies for $4 50; one hundred copies, $8; postage paid in all cases. Let there be this year in every state and territory in the Union a campaign of education. Show the people the immorality, injustice, and danger of the exemption of church property from taxation.

Samuel P. Putnam, of America, poet, orator, and fearless Freethought evangelist, has in the press a work entitled "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." Mr. Putnam, with his fine enthusiasm and literary dash, is just the man to undertake such a task as he has here imposed upon himself; and the heroes and martyrs of humanity against the church will be made to scintillate, and burn, and glow, not merely pass before the reader as cold and bloodless visions, half smothered in dates and dry facts, dryly stated. Of course, a portrait and biograpical sketch of Saladin will appear in this Transatlantic magnum opus, and Ingersoll will jostle Galileo, and Bruno cry across the ages to Huxley. Mr. Putnam deserves much commendation for his colossal design, and those who know him best expect that of that design the execution will be worthy.—R. G. in Agnostic Journal.

The association reports this, the sixteenth season, as the most successful of all, financially and otherwise. The next meeting will be in October. The members of the Association would do well on August 4th, Shelley's birthday, to commemorate the event by an outing.

A GENTLEMAN named Prof. Theo. F. Price, who looked as if he was intended for a priest, but was born and reared a Quaker, and, after witnessing some manifestations of Spiritual phenomena, became a Spiritualist, clairvoyant, and lecturer, spoke before the Manhattan Liberal Club last Friday on "The Three-Fold Man." He said that man was a physical, intellectual, and spiritual being, and when a person dies, his or her spirit leaves the body and soars into spirit land, where there are others who will giv that newly arrived person a right royal welcome He also said that a person is the same in the land of spirits as he was in this world. Whatever education, or intellectual power he had here, he will be the same when "this mortal coil" has been "shuffled off," and that in the Spiritualists' happy land only the law of love prevails. He made the remark that the Spiritualists had done more to banish superstition and ignorance from the world than any other class of reformers. Any statement made in favor of Spiritualism was always applauded by a coterie of persons who always manage to sit in a bunch. The reporter has been told that this club is full of the lovers of the "after-life philosophy."

Prynne of pillory fame defended, when his party was in power, the principle of suppressing dangerous opinions—a principle which, carried out by his enemies, had cost him his ears; and John Knox found a precedent in the action of the Jews, who "lay low" when they were weak, and exterminated, as soon as they had the power, the people whose opinions differed from their own. At Geneva the Protestant Beza fashioned plausible arguments why the Catholic should be made to feel severely the heinousness of standing aloof from the reformed faith; and the same arguments did good service for the Catholics outside the city when they were asked why they harried the unfortunate Protestants. Neither side could understand the true value of toleration. Probably this fierce repression of other men's baneful beliefs was fed by familiarity with the Bible, and with its stern ruling that one side in the Jewish controversy was wholly right, and could wreak its outraged faith upon the rest of the world as opportunity arose.—Family Herald (London).

The Christian religion must rise or fall on its merits, lacking which, constitutional provisions, legislativ enactments and court decisions and precedents cannot save it, and if the preachers had the confidence they profess to hav in its merits they would at once abandon the scheme of engrafting it on the Constitution of the United States, as being unnecessary to its preservation.—Daily News, Tampa, Florida.

"Vaccination by Lancet and Club" is "Anti-Vaccination Tract No. 1," written by Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., and issued by the Murray Hill Publishing Co., 129 East 28th street, New York. For distribution, only 50 cents per hundred. Dr. Foote has driven his lancet—of criticism—in deeply, and the illustration he has introduced helps tell the story. No doubt many of our readers will want the tract.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"...en the dark and the daylight,
...en the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Happy Household.

It's when the birds go piping and the daylight slowly breaks
That, clamoring for his dinner, our precious baby wakes.
Then it's sleep no more for baby, and it's sleep no more for me,
For when he wants his dinner, why, it's dinner it must be!
And of that lacteal fluid he partakes with great ado
While gran'ma laughs,
And gran'pa laughs,
And wife, she laughs,
And I—well, I laugh too!

You'd think, to see us carrying on about that little tad,
That, like as not, that baby was the first we'd ever had.
But, sakes alive! he isn't, yet we people make a fuss
As if the only baby in the world had come to us.
And, morning, noon, and nightime, whatever he may do,
Gran'ma, she laughs,
Gran'pa, he laughs,
Wife, she laughs,
And I, of course, laugh too!

But once—a likely spell ago—when that poor little chick
From teething or from some such ill of infancy fell sick,
You wouldn't know us people as the same that went about,
A-feelin' good all over, just to hear him crow and shout.
And though the doctor poohed our fears and said he'd pull him through Old gran'ma cried,
And gran'pa cried,
And wife, she cried,
And I—yes, I cried too!

It makes us all feel good to hav a baby on the place,
With his everlastin' crowing and his dimpling, dumpling face;
The patter of his pinky feet makes music everywhere.
And when he shakes those fists of his, good-bye to every care!
No matter what our trouble is, when he begins to coo
Old gran'ma laughs,
And gran'pa laughs,
Wife, she laughs,
And I—you bet, I laugh too!

Paine's Care for the Bonneville Children.

Moncure D. Conway, in the seventeenth chapter of his very careful and full life of Paine, tells us of the time, care and money which the great teacher devoted to the training and support of the family of Nicolas Bonneville, in whose home he had lived when in Paris. Here follow some selections which we are sure will interest the Children of the Corner:

"The Bonnevilles, with whom Paine had resided in Paris, were completely impoverished after his departure. They resolved to follow Paine to America, depending on his promis of aid should they do so. Foreseeing perils in France, Nicolas, unable himself to leave at once, hurried off his wife and children—Benjamin, Thomas and Louis. Madam Bonneville would appear to hav arrived in August, 1803. I infer this, because Paine writes, September 23d, to Jefferson from Stonington, Connecticut; and later letters show that he had been in New York, and afterwards placed Thomas Paine Bonneville with the Rev. Mr. Foster (Universalist) of Stonington for education. Madam Bonneville was placed in his house at Bordentown, where she was to teach French. . . .

"Madame Bonneville, unable to speak English, found Bordentown dull, and soon turned up in New York. She ordered rooms in Wilburn's boarding-house, where Paine was lodging, and the author found the situation rather complicated. The family was absolutely without means of their own, and Paine, who had given them a comfortable home at Bordentown, was annoyed by their coming on to New York. . . .

"Nicolas Bonneville still giving no sign, and Madam being uneconomical in her notions of money, Paine thought it necessary—morally and financially—to let it be known that he was not responsible for her debts. When, therefore, Wilburn applied to him for her board ($35), Paine declined to pay, and was sued. Paine pleaded non assumpsit, and, after gaining the case, paid Wilburn the money. It presently turned out that the surveillance of Nicolas Bonneville did not permit him to leave France, and, as he was not permitted to resume his journal or publications, he could neither join his family nor assist them. . . . Paine was presently enjoying himself on his farm at New Rochelle, and Madame Bonneville began to keep house for him. . . .

"Madame Bonneville hated country life, and insisted on going to New York. Paine was not sorry to hav her leave, as she could not yet talk English, and did not appreciate Paine's idea of plain living and high thinking. She apparently had a notion that Paine had a mint of money, and, like so many others, might hav attributed to parsimony efforts the unpaid author was making to save enough to give her children, practically fatherless, some start in life. The philosophic solitude in which he was left at New Rochelle is described in a letter (July 31st) to John Fellows in New York.

"'It is certainly best that Mrs. Bonneville go into some family as a teacher, for she has not the least talent of managing affairs for herself. She may send Bebia up to me. I will take care of him for his own sake and his father's, but that is all I hav to say. . . . I am master of an empty house, or nearly so. I hav six chairs and a table, a straw bed, a feather bed, and a bag of straw for Thomas, a tea kettle, an iron pot, an iron baking pan, a frying pan, a gridiron, cups, saucers, plates and dishes, knives and forks, two candlesticks and a pair of snuffers. I hav a pair of fine oxen and an ox-cart, a good horse, a chair, and a one-horse cart; a cow, and a sow and nine pigs. When you come you must take such fare as you meet with, for I liv upon tea, milk, fruit-pies, plain dumplins, and a piece of meat when I get it; but I liv with that retirement and quiet that suit me. Mrs. Bonneville was an encumbrance upon me all the while she was here, for she would not do anything, not even make an apple-dumplin for her own children. If you cannot make yourself a straw bed, I can let you hav blankets, and you will hav no occasion to go over to the tavern to sleep.'

"It must not be supposed from what Paine says of Madam Bonneville that there was anything acrimonious in their relations. She was thirty-one years younger then Paine, fond of the world, handsome. The old gentleman, all day occupied with writing, could giv her little companionship, even if he could hav conversed in French. But he indulged her in every way, gave her more money than he could afford, devoted his ever decreasing means to her family. She had boundless reverence for him, but, as we hav seen, had no taste for country life. Probably, too, after Dederick's attempt on Paine's life she became nervous in the lonely house. So she had gone to New York, where she presently found good occupation as a teacher of French in several families. Her sons, however, were fond of New Rochelle, and of Paine, who had a knack of amusing children, and never failed to win their affection. In the Tarrytown Argus, October 18, 1890, appeared an interesting notice of the Rev. Alexander Davis (Methodist), by C. K. B[uchanan] in which it is stated that Davis, a nativ of New Rochelle, remembered the affection of Paine, who 'would bring him round-hearts and hold him on his knee.' Many such recollections of his little neighbors hav been reported." . . .

In a letter to William Carver, Mr. Paine refers in a kindly way to his godson, Thomas Paine Bonneville:

"I am glad to hear what you tell me of Thomas. He shall not want for anything that is necessary if he be a good boy, for he has no friend but me."

In 1806, at New Rochelle, Paine's vote was challenged, on the ground that he was not an American citizen, by a supervisor of elections, one Elisha Ward, a Tory during the Revolution. A partial sequel (affecting Ward's son) to the enmity of Ward is related by Gilbert Vale, Paine's biographer:

"At the time of Mr. Paine's residence at his farm, Mr. Ward, now a coffee-roaster in Gold Street, New York, and an assistant alderman, was then a little boy and residing at New Rochelle. He remembers the impressions his mother and some religious people made on him by speaking of Tom Paine, so he concluded that Tom Paine must be a very bad and brutal man. Some of his elder companions proposed going into Mr. Paine's orchard to obtain some fruit, and he, out of fear, kept at a distance behind, till he beheld, with surprise, Mr. Paine come out and assist the boys in getting apples, patting one on the head and caressing another, and directing them where to get the best. He then advanced and received his share of encouragement, and the impression this kindness made on him determined him at a very early period to examin his writings. His mother at first took the books from him, but at a later period restored them to him, observing that he was then of an age to judge for himself; perhaps she had herself been gradually undeceived, both as to his character and writings."

The older members of the Corner family will appreciate these reminiscences and fragments of history selected from Mr. Conway's book:

"I told Walt Whitman, himself partly a product of Hicksite Quakerism, of the conclusion to which I had been steadily drawn, that Thomas Paine rose again in Elias Hicks, and was in some sort the origin of our one American religion. I said my visit was mainly to get his 'testimony' on the subject for my book, as he was born in Hick's region, and mentions in 'Specimen Days' his acquaintance with Paine's friend, Colonel Fellows. Walt said, for I took down his words at the time:

"'In my childhood a great deal was said of Paine in our neighborhood, in Long Island. My father, Walter Whitman, was rather favorable to Paine. I remember hearing Elias Hicks preach; and his look, slender figure, earnestness, made an impression on me, though I was only about eleven. He died in 1830. He is well represented in the bust there, one of my treasures. I was a young man when I enjoyed the friendship of Colonel Fellows—then a constable of the courts; tall, with ruddy face, blue eyes, snowy hair, and a fine voice; neat in dress, an old-school gentleman, with a military air, who used to awe the crowd by his looks; they used to call him "Aristides." I used to chat with him in Tammany Hall. It was a time when, in religion, there was as yet no philosophical middle ground; people were very strong on one side or the other; there was a good deal of lying, and the liars were often well-paid for their work. Paine and his principles made the great issue. Paine was double-damnably lied about. Colonel Fellows was a man of perfect truth and exactness; he assured me that the stories disparaging to Paine personally were quite false. Paine was neither drunken nor filthy; he drank as other people did, and was a high-minded gentleman. I incline to think you right in supposing a connection between the Paine excitement and the Hicksite movement. Paine left a deep, clear-cut impression on the public mind. Colonel Fellows told me that while Paine was in New York he had a much larger following than was generally supposed. After his death a reaction in his favor appeared among many who had opposed him, and this reaction became exceedingly strong between 1820 and 1830, when the division among the Quakers developed. Probably William Cobbett's conversion to Paine had something to do with it. Cobbett lived in the neighborhood of Elias Hicks, in Long Island, and probably knew him. Hicks was a fair-minded man, and no doubt read Paine's books carefully and honestly. I am very glad you are writing the Life of Paine. Such a book has long been needed. Paine was among the best and truest of men.'

"'Paine's risen soul went marching on in England also. The pretended recantation proclaimed there was exploded by William Cobbett, and the whole controversy over Mr. Paine's works renewed. One after another Deist was sent to prison for publishing his works, the last being Richard Carlile and his wife. In 1819, the year in which William Cobbett carried Paine's bones to England, Richard Carlile and his wife, solely for this offense, were sent to prison—he for three years, with fine of £1,500; she for two years, with fine of £500. This was a suicidal victory for bigotry. When these two came out of prison they found that wealthy gentlemen had provided for them an establishment in Fleet Street, where these books were thenceforth sold unmolested. Mrs. Carlile's petition to the House of Commons awakened that body and the whole country. When Richard Carlile entered prison it was as a captiv Deist; when he came out the Freethinkers of England were generally Atheists.

"'A singular coincidence [says Dr. Francis] led me to pay a visit to Cobbett at his country seat, within a couple of miles of the city, on the island, on the very day that he had exhumed the bones of Paine, and shipped them for England. I will here repeat the words which Cobbett gave utterance to at the friendly interview our party had with him. "I hav just performed a duty, gentlemen, which has been too long delayed; you hav neglected too long the remains of Thomas Paine. I hav done myself the honor to disinter his bones. I hav removed them from New Rochelle. I hav dug them up; they are now on their way to England. When I myself return, I shall cause them to speak the common sense of the great man; I shall gather together the people of Liverpool and Manchester in one assembly with those of London, and those bones will affect the reformation of England in church and state.'

"Mr. Badeau, of New Rochelle, remembers standing near Cobbett's workmen while they were digging up the bones, about dawn. There is a legend that Paine's little finger was left in America, a fable, perhaps, of his once small movement, now stronger than the loins of the bigotry that refused him a vote or a grave in the land he so greatly served. As to his bones, no man knows the place of their rest to this day. His principles rest not. His thoughts, untraceable like his dust, are blown about the world which he held in his heart. For a hundred years no human being has been born in the civilized world without some spiritual tincture from that heart whose every pulse was for humanity, whose last beat broke a fetter of fear, and fell on the throne of thrones."

A Poetical Curiosity.

Arthur O'Connor, an Irish general who was implicated in the French invasion of Ireland and spent five years at Fort George, in Scotland, wrote the following lines, which he distributed while on his way to prison in 1798:

I.

"The pomp of courts and pride of kings,
I prize beyond all earthly things;
I love my country,—but the king,
Above all men, his praise I sing;
The royal banners are displayed,
And may success the standard aid.

II.

"I fain would banish far from hence
The Rights of Man and Common Sense,
Confusion to his odious reign,
That foe to princes—Thomas Paine!
Defeat and Ruin seize the cause,
Of France, her liberties and laws."

Read the first line of the second verse immediately after the first line of the first verse—the second line of the second verse, after the second line of the first, and thus contin e throughout to connect the corresponding lines of each verse—having previously read them in the usual manner. The two modes of reading will be found ingeniously to convey distinct and opposit meanings.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

Gems of Thought.

THE very attempt to destroy reason by reason, is a demonstration that men hav nothing but reason to trust in.—Matthew Tindal.

HAV a good time, make life cheerful and bright, dance if you want to, sing if you can, play as long as you liv, and leave the world with a smile.—Investigator.

WE hav no patience with the mawkish philanthropy which would ward off the punishment of stupidity. The ultimate result of shielding men from the effects of folly, is to fill the world with fools.—Herbert Spencer.

AMONG all the relics of barbaric religion which surround us, few are more striking than the phrases which still recognize as a deity the living sky, as "Heaven forgiv me!" "The vengeance of heaven will overtake him."—Dr. E. B. Tylor.

WHAT forests of laurel we bring, and the tears of mankind, to those who stand firm against the opinion of their contemporaries! The measure of a master is his success in bringing all men round to his opinion twenty years later.—Emerson.

THE state has neglected its legitimate work of protecting the citizen in his personal safety and property rights in proportion to the state's unlawful waste of time and power in looking after the private business of the country.—Galveston News.

I BELIEVE in individual initiativ. Yet I am told that individualism is old-fashioned and out of date. How can that be true as long as the individual remains? And when the individual disappears, what becomes of your gospels of collectivism? Everything flows from the individual. He is the reservoir. From him all streams are supplied. Back to him all streams pay tribute. Nor must we forget that we owe the individual the guarantees of democracy. The conditions must further the most extended privilege. Yet no privilege must be given save that which all may share.—Horace L. Traubel.

IF a man be possessed of but one idea, and that a wrong one, he will not only evoke a fetich for himself, but, by the power of concentration and example, institute a very ugly persecution for those who venture to doubt the divinity of his fetich. To do no harm and think no evil is not sufficient in many quarters to insure a man a quiet life; uniformity is a very exacting fetich. To sing in chorus is, to minds of unconquerable torpor, not only easier, but more meritorious than to attempt a solo. And so the dull little fetich unanimity takes the place of thoughtful readjustment of ideas, a process which would entail an almost impious exertion of powers enervated by habitual irresolution and disuse.—Ethics of Fetich Worship, Chambers's Journal.

NOTHING is more common than to hear from the pulpit pictures in words of excitement, of alarm, of terror, of the death-beds of those who hav not lived religious lives; yet, as a rule, if these pictures are supposed to be those of the unfortunates at the moment of death, they are utterly false. In point of fact, ninety-nine of every hundred human beings are unconscious for several hours before death comes to them; all the majesty of intellect, the tender beauty of thought or sympathy or charity, the very love for those for whom love has filled all waking thoughts, disappear. As a little baby just born into the world is but a little animal, so the sage, the philosopher, the hero, or the statesman, he whose thoughts or deeds hav writ themselvs large in the history of the world, becomes but a dying animal at the last. A merciful unconsciousness sets in as the mysterious force we call life slowly takes leave of its last citadel, the heart, and what is has become what was. This is death.—Dr. Cyrus Edson.

WE are now constructing the most expensiv churches that the world has known since the pagan religion was superseded by the "meek and lowly Jesus." They are building one in New York that is to cost $10,000,000. Suppose Christ should come again and should wear what he wore before—a linen gown, a pair of wooden sandals on his feet, no socks, and no hat—do you suppose the minister in that $10-000,000 church would be glad to see Jesus come in? He would be just as happy as the money-changers were in the temple. The finer our churches are, the bigger Mr. Krupp makes his cannon. This may seem queer to you, but it is so. The ball is almost as heavy as a park of artillery used to be. Wherever it hits there is sure to be trouble. We are strange folks. We are constantly building more churches and schoolhouses, and we constantly want more guns. The more we embrace the doctrin that we must love our neighbors as ourselvs, the more thoroughly we prepare to bore a hole through them with a Winchester.—Thomas Watson.

Just Out.—25 Cents.—Five Copies for $1.

A Liberal living in Michigan said once that he would give $25 a year to have the Crimes of Preachers recorded, as the frequent lapses of virtue of the ministers showed how little value Christianity possesses to make men moral.

We have just issued the Fourth Edition of the book doing this. The additions for this new edition of the

"Crimes of Preachers"

shows nearly 400 cases of ministerial conduct. While those in previous editions show that within a few years about

of one kind or another of criminal conduct. Most of the crimes are against women, for the fair sex are at once the weakness and the strength of the church—"the church" meaning of course the clergy.

Notwithstanding the many additional pages, we have kept the price the same, 25 cents. Send for a copy, and confound the churchmen. Show them just what sort of scamps are the clergy who have closed the World's Fair on Sunday, because it is so holy a day that to look upon machinery or paintings in this period is "immoral."

HAND-BOOK OF FREETHOUGHT.

By W. S. BELL.

Containing in condensed and systematized form a vast amount of evidence against the superstitious doctrines of Christianity. As a book of reference and aid to all truth seekers it is invaluable. Its classification of subjects makes it a hand-book. As Ingersoll said of Paine's "Age of Reason," it enables somebody in every village to "corner the parson." Its wide variety of subjects include all the disputed points between Christianity and Freethought

PEN PICTURES OF THE WORLD'S FAIR.

By SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

It is, besides being a complete Guide-Book, the best description of the Fair yet given—poetic, beautiful, accurate. It describes the inauguration ceremonies, gives the director-general's address, the efforts to close the Fair Sundays and the triumph of the Sunday-openers; describes the various buildings and what they contain, and is, all in all, the very best picture of the Fair that can be painted with a pen.

ILLUSTRATED.

A MAP OF JACKSON PARK, enabling the visitor to make his way around, and the stay-at-home to see where he went.

A BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF THE FAIR, enabling one to comprehend at a glance the magnitude of the Exposition, the greatest ever known to the present time.

RELIGION A CURSE, RELIGION A DISEASE, RELIGION A LIE.

By Samuel P. Putnam.

Dedicated to the American Congress, of 1892, which for the sake of Religion, Stabbed Liberty to the Heart.

A work burning with indignation inspired by the Congressional act closing the World's Fair on Sunday—an act which practically united the government and the Christian church.

To which is added Mr. Putnam's address delivered before the Columbian Exposition Committee of the House of Representatives against Sunday closing.

Also the following Essays and Poems by Mr. Putnam, which have never before been put in book form: Orthodoxy; Freethought; Man, Not God (written for a Paine anniversary); The Statue of Liberty and Thomas Paine; a poem written for the opening exercises of the Silverton, Ore., Freethought Hall; Death and Life; The Golden Age; Shut the Door (a poem on the closing of the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia, in 1876).

The main essay in this work is one of the strongest arraignments ever made of the religion which cramps and fetters the minds of the people of this country. It should be distributed widely. It has been commended in the highest terms as it appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER and we hope every reader will buy a copy to lend his neighbor and arouse thought.

"WEEL, friends," said a Scottish clergyman recently, "the kirk is urgently in need of siller, and as we hav failed to get money honestly, we will hav to see what a bazaar can do for us."

"Is the editer in?" asked the poet.
"Yes," said the office boy,
"The editor's safe in heaven,
Where all is peace and joy."
"In heaven?" the poet murmured,
While the "devil" wiped his eyes;
He must hav given the angels
A thundering big surprise!

"SINCE you take me to task so roundly for my failings," said the physician, somewhat nettled, "let me ask why you don't restrain your own son. He gambles, drinks, and plays the races." "Ah, yes," said the clergyman, with a sigh. "We don't seem to exert much influence over our own families, do we? By the way, doctor, please convey my warmest sympathies to your wife and say to her I am sorry she is still unable to find any relief from her rheumatism."—Chicago Tribune.

"MAMMA, dear," said a little girl, "does God know I hav two prayers to say, one one night and the other next night?" "Yes, dear, God knows you hav two prayers to say, one one night, and the other next night." "Mamma, dear, does God know I am going to say to-night, 'Now I lay me down to sleep?'" "Yes, dear, God knows you are going to say to-night, 'Now I lay me down to sleep.'" "But, mamma, I'm not going to say that one; I'm going to say the other one."—One of J. M. L. Babcock's Stories.

IN one of the western New York exchanges appears an obituary notice written and signed by a country correspondent, and as it is one of those gems which can not be improved by cutting, it is given in its entirety and integrity. The paper appropriately places it under the heading: "Joab's Jottings."

DEAR EDITOR: The death angel has made its ingress into our quiet little city, snatching from our midst one of our most deserving and beloved citizens in the person of Mrs. Dr. ——, of Haskinsville. After a protracted illness she departed to the land of the Leal, the morning of the 25th. Funeral 27th at Haskinsville. Services conducted by the Rev. E. Barnston, of our city, who delivered one of his masterly, skilful discourses. Mr. Barnston can bring the world down on a funeral discourse. His sermon was full of pathos and eloquence; the elder is a Bible student and a gentleman of high culture.

The Rev. James Bowen offered up an eloquent prayer. The reverend is a young man of marked ability.

The Rev. Mr. Peet, of Maryland, made a telling closing address; he will be counted in. Mrs. ——, as a vocalist, has no parallel; her voice was like that of an angel, soft and clear, and pathetic, her music proceeded from her heart and reached the hearts of the hearers; she was called upon to sing at hundreds of funerals. She had sung a great many times at Loon Lake church. In short, she was a well-known singer. Mrs. —— will be missed at bedsides of the sick; her hand was always open to relieve the wants of the poor and afflicted. She would go far and near to relieve the wants of the suffering. She always paid into the church. She will be missed at the class-meeting and Sunday-school. Her graceful form will not be seen on the streets any more, but in heaven. She was a complete model of perfection and beauty. But to all the world who will most miss her the doctor and Burchal, her daughter, wife of Mr. Silsbee. The doctor will not, when he comes home at night, find her awaiting his coming with a cup of hot coffee on the stove and a smiling face, with cheering words, but the opposit, a dark house, no words of cheer nor angel smiles to enliven the half-dead manhood; but what grief will come over the bereaved husband when he finds a dark house and that the mistress is lying among the tombs, her eyes closed in death. Doctor, you will see dark days and gloomy shades, but there is one cheering side to this, she is happy. She is among the good of all ages. God bless her ashes.

The funeral was largely attended; people present from eight towns. Music by Sprague's band. Sprague is one of the best musicians in the country. Crosby of Cohocton was the undertaker; his part was well acted. Quite a large crowd followed the corpse to Hornellsville cemetery, where there was quite a crowd assembled awaiting the coming. Among the crowd was the Rev. Mr. Deems, Drs. Parkhill, Smith, and Conderman, E. Page and lady, and quite a number of prominent people of the city were present. The Rev. Mr. Deems pronounced the benediction. Mr. —— gave his wife the greatest possible care, also Burchal, her daughter. The doctor tenders his heartfelt thanks to neighbors and attendants at the funeral.

Very respectfully, JOAB.

The Popes and Their Doings. Biographical sketches of the most noted of these vicars of Christ and vicegerents of God, showing what they have done, and what kind of men they were. It contains very plain statements, in very unvarnished language, and the unmasking is complete, proving them to have been cruel, intriguing, and licentious men. Considering the rapid growth of Catholicism in this country, this book cannot be too widely disseminated. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Awful Disclosures of Maria Monk, as exhibited in a narrative of her sufferings during her residence of five years as a novice, and two years as a black nun, in the Hotel Dieu Nunnery, at Montreal. Perhaps not any anti-Catholic book published has created more excitement, and had such a circulation as this work. To counteract its effects the Catholics circulated a story that Maria Monk was "no better than she should be," but investigation disclosed that her "child of shame" was none other than the child of her priest-seducer Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth 75 cents.

Auricular Confession and Popish Nunneries. By Wm. Hogan, for twenty-five years a confessing priest. A revelation of the licentious practices of the priests and nuns in these religious brothels. There is no question that Ex-priest Hogan knew the truth of the tales of vice, seduction, and infanticide he gives in this volume, and equally there is no question that if the people generally knew of them, Catholicism would not be given the vast amounts of money now allowed it by our various city governments. Price, paper, 50 cents, cloth 75 cents.

The Priest in Absolution. A Review of the system of auricular confession, including copious extracts from the "Confessional Unmasked," from the "Master Key to Popery," etc. The work is a protest against and an appeal to every American citizen to examine carefully and thoughtfully a religious system so invasive of privacy, so powerful for evil in licentious hands, so fraught with danger to female modesty, to the ingenuous openness of youth, and to the freedom of thought, speech, and action. Price, paper, 25 cents.

OF

THE WRITINGS OF THOMAS PAINE.

COLLECTED, EDITED, AND CHRONOLOGICALLY ARRANGED

By MONCURE DANIEL CONWAY.

Author of "The Life of Thomas Paine," "Omitted Chapters of History Disclosed in the Life and Papers of Edmund Randolph," etc.

Four Volumes, Royal Octavo, Gilt Tops, Uniform with the Editor's "Life of Paine" Price per Volume, $2.50.

An edition of one hundred and fifty numbered copies bound in half leather, gilt tops, uniform with the limited editions of "The Writings of Washington," "The Writings of Jefferson," etc. Price, per volume, $4.

For the general reader the $3 edition of Paine's works is sufficient, as it contains all of his writings upon which his fame substantially rests. But for those who desire to go deeper into the subject of the man and polemic we can most unreservedly commend the "Life of Paine" by Mr Conway, and this edition of Paine's works edited by him It is the fullest that we are likely to have, and the student of history, and particularly the writer, should have it upon his shelves.

The work will consist of four volumes, and will be arranged chronologically. The cause of America, as Paine said, made him an author, and the first volume will cover the period of the American Revolution, beginning with the year 1774. It will therefore open with Paine's anti-slavery essay, and his philosophical or moral essays, while editing the Pennsylvania Magazine; these being followed by the great revolutionary, political, and controversial pamphlets which made such a profound impression on the country.

The second volume will consist mainly of the "Rights of Man," and pamphlets relating to English politics, but will also contain certain papers on French affairs.

The third and fourth volumes will consist mainly of Paine's religious writings, but will also contain some essays relating to American affairs, written in his last years. At the close will be given Paine's poems.

The first volume is now ready for delivery, and the others will follow soon Orders for the whole set will be taken and filled as the volumes appear, or the volumes can be purchased separately. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER CO., 28 Lafayette Place, New York.

An Obitnary Notice.

The New York Advertiser of June 9, 1809, has the following notice:

"Mr. Thomas Paine.—

Thy spirit, Independence, let me share.
—Smollett.

"With heartfelt sorrow and poignant regret we are compelled to announce to the world that Mr. Thomas Paine is no more. This distinguished philanthropist, whose life was devoted to the cause of humanity, departed this life yesterday morning, and if any man's memory deserved a place in the breast of a freeman, it is that of the deceased, for

Take him for all in all,
We ne'er shall look upon his like again.

"The friends of the deceased are invited to attend his funeral by 9 o'clock in the morning, from his late residence at Greenwich, from whence his corpse will be conveyed to New Rochelle for interment.

His ashes there,
His fame everywhere."

An Incident.

The following appeal by American citizens in Paris (1794), in behalf of Paine—which is in the shape of a petition for his release from prison—to the National Convention, was found in the national archives at Paris:

"CITIZEN LEGISLATORS: The French nation, by a unanimous decree, hav invited one of the most estimable of our countrymen to come to France; it is Thomas Paine, one of the political founders of the independence and republic of America. A twenty-years' experience has taught America to know and respect his public virtues and the inappreciable services he has rendered his country.

"Convinced that his quality of a foreigner and ex-deputy is the only cause of his provisional apprehension, in the name of our country (and we trust it will be appreciated) we apply to you to claim our friend and countryman, so that he may be able to leave with us for America, where he will be received with open arms.

"As our countryman, and especially as a man so dear to Americans as well as to you, ardent friends of liberty, we do, in the name of that goddess dear to the only two republics in the world, entreat you to render Thomas Paine to his brothers, and to allow us to take him back to his country, which is also our own."

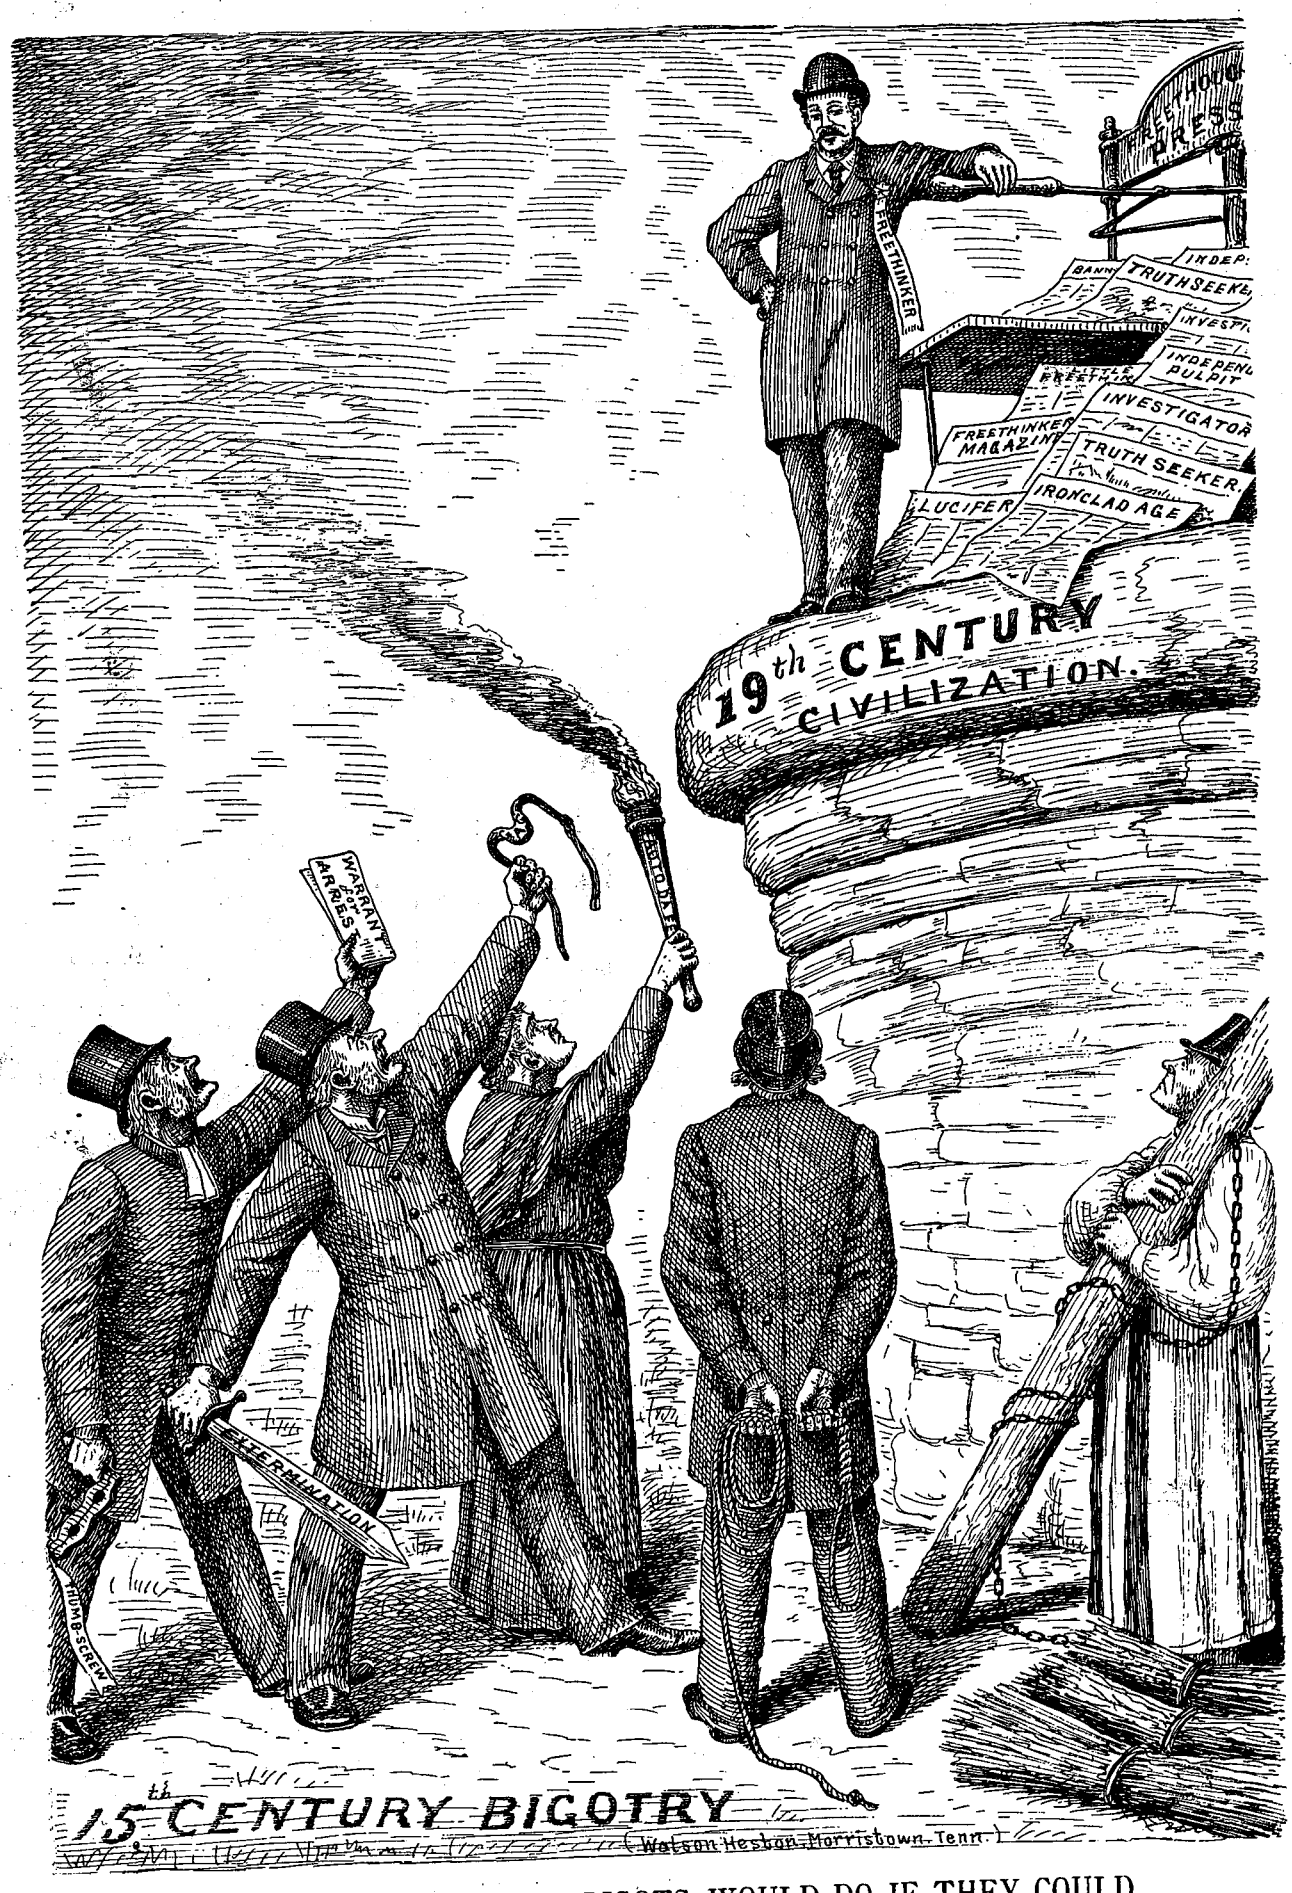
AT present, Comstock, the censor, is trying to suppress the sale of "Rabelais," "Decameron," "Heptameron," Ovid's "Art of Love," Balzac's "Droll Stories," "Tom Jones," "Rousseau's Confessions," "A Thousand and One Nights," "Tales from the Arabic," and "Aladdin." He will succeed, undoubtedly. We hav a habit of submitting to any imposition.

THERE are serious labor troubles in the coal districts of Illinois and other Middle states. The strikers hav driven out and injured workers and destroyed property. Troops hav been sent to Centralia and La Salle, Ill. Governor Altgeld orders the soldiers to suppress riots, keep the peace, and enforce the laws, but not to protect private property. It is generally supposed that the enforcement of the laws includes the protection of property, but if it does not, we need some new definitions.

DR. KNOX, of Danbury, Conn., writes as follows, under date of May 21st:



DEAR EDITOR AND READERS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Our city has been visited the past week by a religious cyclone in the person of Monsignor Satolli, to whom not only his own clique paid homage and kissed his paw in reverence, but all, with but one exception, of the Protestant sky pilots as well. Even C. S. Andrews, our mayor, and many city officials, met him (in Salvation Army style) with cheap music and bowed heads to bid him welcome, and guarantee our beautiful city subservient to the church. Reflecting upon the above scene, the Christian religion presents all the characteristics of an illegitimate circus; viz., St. Peter's Cathedral in Rome represents the show; Pope Leo and Satolli the clowns; the priests the wind-bags or solicitors for the side-shows; the Protestant clergy, the fakirs and bunco sharps to the masses that the other manipulators do not fleece, all bartering to the credulous and susceptible public for cash down unknown and intangible treasures in an unknown locality after the game was well capped by the mayor and others holding city positions dedicated to them by the Pope.

We believe that not only can good be done but money made by any Liberal who will canvass for our book "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated." In fact we know one man who worked at it but a few hours weekly and sold nearly fifty copies in a month. The price is low; everybody knows the Old Testament stories, and nearly everybody would like a book applying nineteenth-century wit and knowledge to them. People like to laugh. Reverence for the Old Testament tales has largely disappeared and jokes at the expense of Jonah and Joseph and Esau and Samson and David, and the other worthies of unsavory reputation, are keenly appreciated. It seems to us that the book will sell at sight. It does here in the store. Liberals out of employment will find this a good way to make an honest dollar.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A Nineteenth Century Novel.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world.

How Much Liberty Would They Leave Us?

President Scovel, a leading advocate of theocracy, in a long, carefully prepared and revised address on the Christian amendment, makes this observation: "The amendment will just provide for that limitation of liberty of conscience which lies in the necessity of the case and is accepted by every civilized nation under the sun." The "necessity" of what "case"? What is meant by this other than the obligation which Christians feel themselvs under to compel a political recognition of their dogmas? This is what President Scovel means and this is the intent of the proposed amendment, of all Sunday laws, of the modern Protestant movement for the inculcation of religious tenets in the schools, etc., etc. Here is an admission that the liberty of conscience is to be denied, to the extent that is necessary to the enthronement of the Christian priesthood.

The theocrats claim the right to insist on this limitation because, as they assert, we who are nativ born and all those who come among us hav well known all along that our nation and our social life are Christian by tradition, custom, and inheritance, spite of the constitutional guarantee of religious freedom and equality before the law. Because we hav known this, as is asserted, we hav no right to complain when logical Christians seek to make our Constitution harmonize with our traditions and our inherited customs. It is conveniently forgotten that progress is the watchword of thinking people, and that the hope and the effort of such hav been, not to nullify the nobler principles of the Constitution in order to make that instrument harmonize with the exclusiv, persecuting spirit and habits of our ancestors, but, rather, to outgrow the old limitations, to develop in our citizens a more exalted purpose that will lead to a juster practice and gradually bring our statutes and our customs into harmony with the Constitution. It is forgotten that those who hav come to our shores for greater liberty of conscience hav been guided hither not by the violations of the sublime spirit of freedom, not by the persecution to which some dissenters hav been subjected, but by the positiv promises and guarantees of the fundamental law and the general report that this was and is a free country, so far, at least, as the professions and practice of religion are concerned. Dr. McAllister made the same disingenuous plea in regard to the Jews, saying that they could not and would not oppose the amendment because they had come to America knowing that they would find here the Christian liberty for which the theocrats are so anxious to secure the protection of the Constitution. Of course they came here for nothing of the kind. In so far as they were induced to come by considerations having relation to religion they hav made their homes among us because they desired freedom of conscience, not because they sought "Christian liberty," for that is something not at all desirable, being only a misleading synonym for theological despotism. The Christian liberty fathered by the theocrats is fundamentally and irreconcilably antagonistic to those principles of religious liberty and equality which are sanctioned by the Constitution and known to the world as the best and most distinctiv heritage we received from thee Revolutionists. Since Dr. McAllister made his sophistical argument before the House Committee he has been emphatically contradicted and answered by the representativs of the Jews, and he has received fully as positiv a reply from the German Lutherans. Generally speaking, the immigrants from Europe did not come to the United States to help nativ traitors overthrow the secular republic and put a Covenanter theocracy in its place.

Dr. Scovel avers that those who antagonize "Christian morals" knew long ago that these "are in our origin, in our laws, in our practice and our practices," and hence must not be lightly touched. Of course we all know now what the phrase "Christian morals" means, and we do not break out into a cold sweat of apprehension and fear when we are accused of being not over friendly to that sort of "morals." Frankly, we must say that "Christian morals" are archaic, cruel, unscientific, and absurd. What the race has evolved in its slow and painful march up from the prehistoric past is for us to study and to add to by our experience, but it is not honest to throw in with this ethical code what is called "Christian morals" and label the whole with the name of the infinitesimal part. "Christian morals" had their origin in the brains of theologians and anti-naturalists and are to-day defended by ecclesiastics whose craft depends upon the continued duping of the people. Sunday laws are a fair expression of what are called Christian morals, but their only relations to real morality are those of contrast and deadly antagonism. President Scovel says:

"We affirm that in this amendment not an ounce of pressure will be added to the conscience of any soul of all our millions. They who hav entered or they who are home-born hav accepted the condition of things which exists. The individual conscience in conflict with the public morality will always be treated with consideration, and no positiv act will be required contravening that private conviction if it can possibly be avoided in the process of expressing the positiv Christian character of the nation. To that expression the nation, the creature of God, is bound by highest conceivable obligation."

In other terms: There will be no more persecution than will be necessary! The Christians are bound to get into the saddle and to stay there, but they do not care to ride over the unfortunate heretics in a reckless fashion. That might inconvenience themselvs. They will not constrain conscience except in so far as it has to be done in order to compel everybody to conform outwardly to the dominant theology. That is all. It is not very much. A mere trifle, in fact. But Rome never did any more. Calvin did not go beyond that. Neither did the English Protestants when they were engaged in the business of hanging and burning Catholics. That is all the Puritans did when they tied naked Quaker men and women to the tails of carts and whipped them through Massachusetts villages. They were not ambitious of accomplishing anything more serious than the suppression of free speech and liberty of worship when they banished Mary Hutchinson and Roger Williams. None of those delightful and highly moral people, the persecutors for opinion's sake, hav wanted much—just the privilege of having their own way and of forcing all the rest of the world to coincide with them. They are very agreeable folks to know when they are in a hopeless minority and cannot hav the least influence in shaping legislation or coloring social customs outside of their own pale. Then they contribute somewhat to the hilarity of the nations, as a rattlesnake or tiger, when safely caged, givs pleasure to the youthful visitors at the show. But when these rabid creedists are in a majority, as in the days of the witch-burners, or when, as at present, although apparently in the minority, they yet possess great influence and secure the obsequious attention of legislators, they are more to be dreaded than the reptile in his burrow or the wild beast in the jungle.

We are told that we hav "accepted the condition of things which exists." This is not true, so far as a very intelligent minority are concerned. What is more, we are determined not to accept it at any time nor to any extent. We hav to submit to certain disagreeable and outrageous conditions and rules, but submission under protest is not acceptance. Even if we had accepted, through ignorance, we hav not alienated our right to withdraw that nominal acceptance and demand a new and fair deal, now that our eyes are open to the abomination. Of course this is the situation with many, and their numbers grow larger each day.

President Scovel's declaration that the "individual conscience in conflict with the public morality" (i. e., with the church dogmas which the theocrats claim constitute, in some unexplainable way, "the public morality") "will always be treated with consideration," is a curious illustration of the workings of the clerical mind. As a matter of history, the conscience of the dissenter has always been treated by such men as President Scovel with the "consideration" which the ruling civilization of the time compelled them to accord to it—not one particle more. The "consideration" which the Adventists receive in Tennessee, Maryland, and Arkansas is expressed in the concrete forms of fines, jails, and chain-gangs. Just now it is President Scovel's cue to talk very softly, because he wants more power for his party, but he cannot get enough velvet into his mouth nor sufficient honey upon his lips to dull to the ear of the Freethinker the occasional snap and grind of the hard, strong teeth that are so eager to tear and devour the flesh of all who do not bend the knee and bow the head in adoration before the altar of the Baal of divine rule. The liberty which this man and those for whom he speaks will not take from us is the liberty they cannot take, just as the burglar leaves the safe or the kitchen range. No history-enlightened rationalist will trust anything to their magnanimity.

As our readers hav no doubt observed, the orders for "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" continue to come in, and the West is still in the lead. The procrastination of our printers and artists has slightly extended the duration of the "eleventh hour," and so there is yet a little time before the last form, which will contain the names of subscribers, goes to press. Our offer of "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" and THE TRUTH SEEKER for a year, for $6.50 holds good to the last minute. Be sure to send corrections if we do not print your name right.

Is Presbyterianism becoming more conservativ? In the General Assembly last year Professor Briggs was suspended by a vote of 376 to 116; this year Dr. Smith is overborne by a vote of 396 to 101.

This issue of the TRUTH SEEKER is copyrighted, including the Paine memorial addresses and the illustrations. All concerned will please bear this fact in mind.

INGERSOLL'S TRIBUTE TO THE AUTHOR-HERO

Freethinkers of New York and Vicinity Gather About the Monument of the Great World-Patriot and Listen to the Orators of the Day

No doubt the ministers, who are in the counsel of "divine providence," can explain why it was that, although it had been raining most of the time for considerably more than a week, and although the weather was threatening and ominous a l day on Wednesday, May 30th, it was just short of b ing sufficiently so to deter the people from coming out, and the rain held off until the Paine commemorativ exercises at New Rochelle were completed according to program, and the hundreds of men and women who had participated in honoring the memory of the world's patriot and sage had all reached their respectiv homes in safety. It was a delightful day for an outing; the temperature was the happy medium between the chilliness of spring and the sweltering heat of summer. There was exactly the right kind of a breeze; the skies were lightly clouded; no annoying insects obtruded themselvs; daisies and buttercups spangled meadow, pastureland, and roadside with white and gold; the tuliptrees shook their bells of bloom, while the rich perfume of the locust sweetly scented the air of May. Of course all this was nature's unconscious work, and not even the most zealous preacher will be able to find in the event the slightest trace of anything "providential."

At 12.30 P M. a train of eight coaches pulled out of the Grand Central Depot, over the tracks of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railway, carrying about four hundred very much alive Brooklyn and New York Freethinkers, including quite a number from other points in this state and in New Jersey and Connecticut. At the monument these were joined by several hundred from New Rochelle and vicinity, making a total attendance of probably not less than seven hundred.

A Liberal did not need to feel alone in that crowd; all about him he could see happy-faced, intelligent men and women wearing neat badges of blue, bearing the legend: "Thomas Paine Memorial at New R chelle, N. Y., May 30, 1894; Brooklyn Philosophical As ociation." Except with the most formal, it was a sufficient introduction, and was the means of making many sterling Liberals acquainted with each other. Freethinkers particularly need to cultivate sociability. The now most potent force operating to perpetuate the power of the churches is the social union of those organizations. It is our work to supplant the old with the new, and to do this most readily and effectually, we must, after we hav accomplished the intellectual emancipation of the adherents of the churches, make them feel at home among us. Such celebrations as this at New Rochelle are most effectiv aids in this direction.

Among the Liberals present were Colonel and Mrs. Ingersoll, Miss Maud Ingersoll, Thaddeus B. and Miss Wakeman, S. P. Putnam, Henry Rowley, N. F. Griswold, Meriden, Conn.; Capt. Silas Latham, Dr. E. B. Foote, Sr., and Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., Dr. C. S. Weeks, Jesse Clark, Dr. Wright, Robert Wade, Troy, N. Y; Mrs. Eliza B. Burnz, Mrs. C. M. Tregear, Miss S. Levin, Thos. Duntze, secretary of the Association, Moses Goldsmith, Henry Nichols, E. C. Walker, Capt. George W. Loyd, Geo. E. and Mrs. Grace L. Macdonald, Mrs. M. Smith, of Newark, N. J.; Mrs. Beckwith, Dr. C. L. Andrews, Wilson McDonald, Robert H. Barry, Peter Eckler, Channing and Mrs. A. T. Burnz, Wm. Hauenstein, Paul S. Tucker, Mr. Lovell, of Newark; Paul Fisher, W. B. DuBois, and W. V. Winham. A jovial party came with Dexter K. Cole on his steamer "Mystery." Among these gentlemen were G. W. Call, John Scott, Nelson L. Pidgeon, and Edward E. Sammis. Perhaps the happiest of those on the ground was Capt. Geo. Loyd, who bears the weight of ninety-two years as though it were but a feather. He was very much in evidence and always aptly so. Miss Levin took a large number of views of the monument, the platform when occupied by the different speakers, the assemblage, and the old homestead. It is fortunate that she will giv our readers an opportunity to procure some excellent pictures of the monument, the groups of notables, and the farmhouse.

Across the White Plains and New Rochelle road was hung a banner, bearing, in large white letters, the word "Welcome." The monument was festooned with flowers of all hues, and at its base was heaped a mass of wreaths and bouquets.

The platform was erected beside a small building standing in the lane that leads to the Paine house on the hill to the north, the audience occupying the space between the monument and the speaker's stand. The latter was ornamented with the stars and stripes and appropriate mottoes. At the back of the stand was delineated the sublime sentiment of Thomas Paine, "Spare the Man, but Kill the Monarchy." The good taste and appropriateness of the arrangements were the subjects of universal commendation. True to its traditions and purpose, the Brooklyn Philosophical Association does well whatever it sets out to accomplish, and the memorial testimonial to Paine at New Rochelle

COLONEL INGERSOLL CAUSES A SMILE.

"Sometimes I think that a lie is the healthiest thing that was ever born into the world."

on May 30th, 1894, was no exception to the rule. Every Freethinker in the United States and in the world at large has an immediate and perpetual interest in such celebrations as this, so well conceived and so admirably consummated. They are pleasurable in anticipation, delightful in participation, and of great and lasting benefit. When the people cease to believe the falsehoods about Thomas Paine, which the clergy hav been industriously circulating for nearly one hundred years, they will also cease to believe a good many other stories that they hav heretofore accepted unquestioningly.

Henry Rowley, president of the Brooklyn Philosophical Association, presided. After the meeting had come to order, under the influence of a cornet solo, he welcomed the people in the name of the Association, and made the introductory remarks which follow:

Ladies and Gentlemen: It is delightful to behold such a splendid gathering as this, and on behalf of the Brooklyn Philosophical Association I giv you all a cordial welcome.

About twelve months ago a few enthusiastic Liberals made a pilgrimage to this spot, and it occurred to them, as it has no doubt to thousands of others, that the man in whose brain the idea of American independence first took definit shape, and whose pen was the first to write those glorious words, the Free and Independent States of America; that the man who has aroused the slumbering sense of mental liberty in the minds of millions of men and women, should not be forgotten, but rather that his name should be perpetuated throughout the ages as the symbol of pure and ardent patriotism.

While it did not appear practicable to undertake the erection of a large and fitting monument—of which there should be hundreds—yet there was no reason why the simple memorial stone should remain dilapidated and uncared for None of this little group of pilgrims was overburdened with worldly riches, but one of them, Mr. Barry—who, I am glad to say, is with us to-day—said: "If the Brooklyn Philosophical Association will undertake the work of organizing a suitable demonstration, I will guarantee to pay the entire cost of renovating and beautifying Paine's monument at New Rochelle." Do I not express your unanimous opinion when I say that such an offer did credit to the mind and heart of Mr. Barry? Our association enthusiastically indorsed the proposal, and we are here to-day to consummate the work and to publicly pay respect to the character and worth of the Author-hero of the American Revolution—Thomas Paine.

It would be difficult to find in the annals of history any man whose character has been so persistently vilified as that of Thomas Paine. He has been represented as being ignorant, drunken, and blasphemous, that he was an activ and vigilant agent of the devil with a remarkable power for rushing the weak and innocent to bottomless perdition. There is not the faintest shadow of truth in any of these charges, and any man—whether he be politician or priest—who repeats them is a vender of lies. There is no longer any excuse for ignorance regarding Paine's life, character and work. Mr. Conway's Life tells the plain and simple story supported by the most irrefragable evidence.

Instead of an ignorant man he was a wise one; instead of a drunken man he was sober, modest, and virtuous; instead of a blasphemer he was a patient searcher of truth, an implacable foe of political shams and priestly intolerance.

Paine's real, activ life began when he arrived in this country in his thirty-seventh year. This was about nineteen months previous to the signing of the Declaration of Independence. His activ mind quickly grasped the situation and he enthusiastically entered into the American cause. The state of the public mind may be gathered from a remark made by Benjamin Franklin, when he said in London, as late as 1775, that he had never heard any man in America, either drunk or sober, declare for separation. Why this sudden and radical change in public sentiment? Why, "Common Sense" had appeared. Its effect was magical—phenomenal—as unexpected as a star in the heavens at noonday. The thinking, progressiv colonists were converted. A riot became a revolution. The words of "Common Sense" burned themselvs into the brain of the people. They ceased to be subjects of a king and became citizens of a free Republic. Some of the passages in this little pamphlet are marvels of expression. Never had such simple words been used in so mighty an argument. Take as samples: "Monarchy and succession hav laid the world in blood and ashes." "Of more worth is one honest man to society and in the sight of God than all the crowned ruffians that ever lived."

Paine's labor did not cease with the writing of a popular pamphlet. Indeed, it only began then. He had given a new direction to affairs, and he was not the man to abandon a half-won cause. He continued to be the genius and spirit of a struggling nationality. It is to be remarked that the most remarkable characteristic of Paine was the trustiness of his word and the promptitude of his acts. His powers of concentration were immense and his knowledge of facts enormous. Economical of words but prodigal of thoughts, he wrote to convince, not to please. He called things by their right names, and brought the truth to daylight.

Hav you ever contemplated the situation of the American army at Trenton? I know of nothing more tragic, nothing so momentous. Distressed and famished soldiers, with a disheartened general to lead them. Amid the snows of winter and under the crushing influence of despair. Paine was with them, but did not share their gloom. He wrote the first number of the "Crisis," and around the camp-fire the men gather to hear it read. What a scene for the artist's canvas! What a theme for the poet's genius! The first sentence was thrilling and sounded the note of victory. "These are the times that try men's souls." "Tyranny, like hell, is not easily conquered." You know the rest. Is it not, friends, a glorious thing to be engaged this day in doing honor to the man who achieved such victories for humanity?

Paine's life may be divided, for convenient study, into two parts. In the first part he produced "Common Sense" and the "Crisis," American in their subject and application. In the second part he produced the "Rights of Man" and the "Age of Reason," both of them universal in their subject and application.

The "Rights of Man" not only crushed the arguments of the great political philosopher, Edmund Burke, but it sowed the seed of political freedom throughout the civilized world. The "Age of Reason" was a glorious climax. Without it Paine's work would hav been incomplete. He would hav neither political nor religious tyranny. He stood alone in the integrity of his own manhood. He wanted men to be free indeed, with wide intellectual horizons and sympathetic hearts. They cannot so long as they are bound to king, priest, creed, and Bible. If this were an experience meeting I might ask all those who hav not read the "Age of Reason" to hold up the right hand. If there should be any I would say, "Go, friend, buy a copy, study its pages, and you will be born again." Paine stood, in his day, where Dr. Briggs stands to-day. The only men in the church worth attention are the heretics. To be tried for heresy is to be immortalized. Paine was just a hundred years older than Briggs.

By the side of this simple monument let us reconsecrate ourselvs to the cause of human brotherhood and to the dissemination of those glorious principles of mental liberty to which Thomas Paine devoted his life.

At the conclusion of his address, Mr. Rowley read George E. Macdonald's poem, "Paine; the Knight-Errant of Freedom," which appeared on the first page of our PAINE MEMORIAL NUMBER. Mr. Rowley has an excellent voice, and he did justice to the poem and to himself. Next came S. P. Putnam, who read his poem, "Freethought and Paine," which also adorned the MEMORIAL NUMBER. The audience gave "The Pilgrim" hearty greeting and frequent and warm applause, as it had the president. It is clear that they are both favorits with the Freethinkers of this part of the country.

When Colonel Ingersoll was announced and advanced to the front of the platform he was welcomed rapturously, the applause breaking out again and again. Throughout the delivery of his address the enthusiastic audience cheered him to the echo and at its conclusion he retired in a storm of acclamations. Here is his oration in full:

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: More than one hundred years ago, in the year 1774, Thomas Paine, then a young man of thirty-seven or eight, came to our shores. He was an Englishman; and while I remember the history of that land—the brutalities, the savagery of that people—while I remember their crowned idiots and their robed hypocrites—while I remember all that is bad and all that is great and glorious, I say here to-day that better blood than the English blood never coursed in human veins. He came here, his life up to that time having been, to all appearances, an unbroken and unadulterated failure.

He was born among the poor, and, so far as I know, his parents never thought nor did anything notable. He had, so far as we know, but little education, but a vast deal, as it turned out, of information. He had great capacity, a great brain, and he knew a marvelous number of facts, of things. He had lived close to the breast of nature and during all the years of failure in England he was a thinker, and he commenced at the bedrock. He was not dazed by glitter, by show, by custom, by genius; nothing deceived him. He saw through all the glorified fog; he saw things as they were, and he came here just as people were beginning to think about forming a nation.

He had nothing to recommend him in the world except a letter of introduction signed by a very great Infidel—so great, that when I think of him I feel as though he was kindred of the mountains, as though he were related to the constancy of the stars, one of the greatest, one of the serenest of men, Benjamin Franklin. He was another man who saw to the bedrock, and who was not deceived by prophets, who was not deceived by bloody and ignorant and savage revelation from a monster God.

That is all he had, that letter of introduction, and showing that in the city of Philadelphia, after teaching school a little while, he was employed to write on a magazine, the Pennsylvania Magazine, and I want to show you now that the man's mind was filled with great subjects about which he had great thoughts, and the first article was one against negro slavery, prophesying the trouble it would bring, the blood it would shed upon American soil. Another article was against the infamous practice of dueling, of which Sidney Smith said it was a civilized institution among savages and a savage institution among civilized men. The next, an article on the rights of woman, on marriage and divorce, on the infinite brutality of compelling a woman to live with a man she loathed, abhorred, and despised. The next, on international arbitration, to do away with war. The next, on the treatment of criminals in prisons, showing that humanity should never be forgotten by the state. I am simply telling you a few of the things in this man's mind; even then writing upon international copyright, a thing that was achieved only a year or two ago.

In a little while his attention was turned to the politics of the thirteen colonies, and as we are now standing by the monument of Paine, we might as well tell the truth.

A majority of the colonists were not in favor of independence, and they never were, never. There was not one day from the battle of Lexington to the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown when more than one-third of the colonists were in favor of founding a new nation. Let us tell the truth about them; the country was full of Tories, but the one-third, thoroughly organized, in each one's heart a flame and in each one's brain a star, they accomplished, in spite of their false brethren and in spite of the power of England, the great work and founded the Republic. But when Paine arrived nobody was in favor of independence. He fired the first gun. He asked the question, "Is it to the boy's interest to remain a boy all his life? Is it to our interest to be eternally colonists or to become a nation?"

That man, without an education so-called, had the finest use of the English language of any man of his time. He was the best intellectual marksman then alive. He hit the center. He used plain, simple, common, forcible English that had ligament and nerve, and he wrote sentences that throbbed as though they had hearts, lines that are alive, and he touched the common sense of mankind; and I say to-day that he did more to establish this Republic than any other man that ever stood on the soil of this continent; and when I say that I remember Franklin, and I remember that other great Infidel, Thomas Jefferson; I remember George Washington; and yet, remembering those names, I say that we are more indebted to-day for the liberty we enjoy to Thomas Paine than to any other man that ever stood upon this continent; and let me tell you, he did more for liberty than all the ministers alive in 1776; he was a greater power than all the pulpits combined in the direction of right.

That man was the first to write the words "The United States of America;" that man was the originator of the Bank of the United States. That man was the first to suggest a constitution, a greater bond of union than the old Articles of Confederation.

I want you to know something about him. He was a thinker, and he had the courage of his thoughts; and no man spoke braver, clearer than he for everything just, charitable, honest, free and good. Never in his whole life did he utter a word against anything that is good, never, not one; and no man stood higher when the Revolutionary war closed than Thomas Paine.

Having done what he wished here, having succeeded in forming one government recognizing at least the rights of white men, he went to England, and in a few years produced his "Rights of Man," which was an effort to remodel and reform the British Constitution; but at that time the British were savages; patriotism was treason; good sense was heresy; the patriot went to prison and the thinker went to hell.

In 1791 he went to France. He became a member of the French Convention. He was elected by four departments, but he sat for the department of Calais; and there the principle of this man was put to the test. He was one of the makers of the French Constitution, of their Bill of Rights, and while he sat in that convention the question came up as to what should be done with the king, Louis. Should he be exiled? Should he be killed? What should be done with him? The nation was insane. France had risen from the wrongs of a thousand years; for one thousand years the church, the altar, and the throne had been living on the blood of France. Women were yoked with cattle, plowing in the field. Men and women belonged to the soil; they were sold like beasts, and there were no human rights. It took the Catholic church a thousand years to bring about this blessed state of things. But Paine was a man of principle, a philanthropist; and although he knew that he would be suspected, imprisoned, and beheaded if he voted for the life of the king, he had the principle and the courage to say, "No, kill the monarch, but not the man; let him become a useful citizen; it was the man's misfortune to be a king." When he gave that vote he knew that his life depended upon it, and in the history of the world there is nothing sublimer than the conduct of Thomas Paine upon that occasion. He was seized; he was imprisoned.

Just before that time, after having turned his attention to kings and thrones, he took it into his head that he would look behind the altar. He had found that nobles were wretches, parasites living on the blood of honest labor, and he thought he would turn his attention to priests, and he then wrote the first part of the "Age of Reason," and left the manuscript with Joel Barlow. Then, cast into prison, and while in prison, under the shadow of the guillotine, expecting every moment to be called out to be beheaded, he wrote the second part of "The Age of Reason;" and let me say here to-day that there never has been a clergyman or a doctor of divinity (and it isn't wonderful that such divinity needs doctors)—there never has been one great enough, ingenious enough, educated enough to answer the arguments ofThomas Paine as found in the "Age of Reason."

He took the ground that the Bible is not inspired, that it is not the word of an infinitely wise and benevolent God; and there is not to-day beneath the cope of heaven an enlightened clergyman who thinks it is. How any human being can read that book, with all its ignorance, with all its atrocities, with its murders and slavery and polygamy, and hell to boot; how any man can read it now and imagine that it was inspired by anybody except a savage, is beyond the power of my imagination.

Paine remained in prison, saved from the guillotine by an accident, was finally released, and in 1802 came back to the United States.

The "Age of Reason" had been published. The priests had read it. They could not answer it. What was the next best thing? To attack him—to attack his character, to denounce him; and they commenced, and they are at it now. I don't believe there has ever been an orthodox minister, who has talked on the subject, who has told the truth. I never heard of him if he did; and nearly all intelligent people now, with the exception of the orthodox clergy, know the principal facts in the life of Thomas Paine; and yet every pulpit has been a mint in which slanders and calumnies have been coined against the grandest of American patriots. Will it ever cease? I do not know. Sometimes I think that truth is the weakest thing in the world. I do. Sometimes I think that a lie is the healthiest thing that was ever born into the world. No mattor how old it is, it appears without a wrinkle, with ears undulled, with eyes undimmed, fresh as a drop of dew in the heart of a rose; and these lies about Paine pass current to-day in the orthodox world.

You see, the reason was this: The Christians did not think that God could afford to let Paine die in peace. Paine had done what he could to rescue the reputation of God from the slanders of the pulpit. He did not succeed entirely, but he did the best he could; and the ministers said, "If God allows that man to die in peace there's something wrong." Now God is just mean enough to try to frighten a dying man. Think of an infinite being, whose thoughts are stars, whose dreams are constellations—think of that being putting in his time frightening a man that is on the crumbling edge of the grave. What a magnificent God—for a cannibal to worship!

For nearly forty years this man had been a herald of the dawn. In the darkness of night he was the star. For nearly forty years he had labored night and day for the happiness of his fellowmen, and Christians could not believe that God would allow such a man to die in peace. So they manufactured the facts to fit their theory, and they stated that at the last he recanted.

What had he to recant? He had talked in favor of liberty, honesty, virtue, kindness. Did God want him to recant? That was all he had to take back.

But the fact is that Thomas Paine died as he lived. He had thought about these things and he knew what his thought was. He had reached the conclusion that if God exists he is not unjust; that he does not believe in savagery, in wars of extermination. He had reached the conclusion that if God were infinite and all-wise, he had at least common sense; and he said so, and that was all the crime he committed. And yet in America the orthodox church has sacrificed its reputation for veracity upon the grave of Thomas Paine.

Nobody believes a minister now. Everybody knows that every word from the pulpit against the great and glorious man of the past is absolutely untrue. But do you know that sometimes I get a little sorry for the clergy? I have lived to see the brand of mental inferiority put on every orthodox brain. I have lived to see the time when the thinkers, the philosophers, the men of real thought, are on the other side.

And so I tell you to-day that in the great battle between reason and superstition we have passed midnight. In the great battle between government by the people and government by God through kings, we have passed midnight. The tendency of the world to-day is toward representative government. The tendency of the world to-day is toward absolute intellectual liberty, toward intellectual hospitality, toward allowing every human being to make the best guess he can on a subject that he knows nothing about.

In the great battle between living for this world and some other, we have passed midnight, and we are living now for this world. We want houses and good food and good clothes; we want books; we want pictures, we want music with its thrilling voice; we want everything there is of joy and gladness beneath the stars; and when we come to another world (if we ever do), we will attend to that.

The world has at last concluded (I mean the sensible ones) to live for this life.

We hav concluded that that man is the greatest man who adds most to the sum of human happiness here in this world; and we are believers in homes here, in the family here, and we think more of our families than we do of all the Gods and Christs you can cram into infinite space.

And the man who did as much as any other to help on the human race along this great highway of intellectual and physical progress, a man who did as much as any other is the man we honor to-day. He lived a laborious life. He was one of the greatest soldiers in the army of human progress, and his reputation is now increasing every day, every day; and in a few years, when the American people meet on the fourth day of July to pay honors to the memory of the great, and when they speak of Washington, and Jefferson, and Franklin, they will also speak of Thomas Paine; and the time will come when in the temple of liberty, our temple, the highest niche will be occupied by the Author-hero of the Revolution, Thomas Paine.

Following another cornet solo Thaddeus B. Wakeman delivered a forceful, feeling, ringing, that is, characteristic, speech. Here is the text of it:

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: After the impressiv words of our glorious Colonel, what can take the place of the reflectiv silence that should follow? Only thoughts that can possibly add depth and purpose to what we hav been charmed to hear.

Let us, then, remember that this is Decoration Day, our great national festival of the dead; and at the same time the festival of the rebirth of our national union by the close, in May, 1865, of our great civil war. It is our second, our solemn Fourth of July. It is the fitting time, then, to gather, as we hav, at the grave and monument of the one who really by his "Common Sense" and "Crisis" laid the cornerstone of our great republic, and enabled sixty-five millions of us to greet each other as "fellow-citizens." We hav gathered here, because in this festival of the dead we hav a duty, a work in hand, in regard to this founder of our common country. That work our noble Ingersoll, and those who hav spoken before him to-day, hav taken well in hand, and urged nobly forward! What is that work, do you say? For fear you Liberals may not catch on at once, let me say it in theological phrase: The work we are here to do is to lift the soul of Thomas Paine out of purgatory! For there is where the stupid bigotry of his time left him at death. Not only that, but sure we must make it that he has his proper place in heaven!—the scientific and human heaven that is to be. No heaven of the good can be complete without this emancipator of mankind, this founder of republics. Thomas Paine was in his day the disinterested and devoted impersonation of liberty, science, and humanity. These are the three words upon which our new era, our new and real heaven, is founded. The monument of him who embodied them, and made them working and saving powers in the world, stands before us! Failings he had—but they were the mere accidents of his time, his career, and his devotion.

"For all human failings
A pure humanity atones,"

says the Sage of Weimar. He who first used the words, "The Religion of Humanity" and "The United States of America," and spent his life to make them realities—who can longer keep any heaven closed against him! But more than that, he was the prophet of the great seed-time of the Revolutions one hundred years ago; as such he worked out the lines of reformatory progress for us to-day.

It is astonishing to find, as his biographer, Mr. Conway, and our colonel to-day hav pointed out, that there is scarcely a reform or step of progress in state, church, or society from antislavery to woman suffrage and on, and then on to the final triumph of the great federal republic of mankind, that he did not inaugurate and indicate its lines of progress and triumph. Those lines can lead us nowhere else but to the heaven of human love and gratitude, if to no other.

If there is any other heaven, the churches cannot much longer keep him out. His was the gospel of love and hope. So let us not despair of the churches. Burns would not despair even of the devil; he thought, "Auld Nickie Ben, ye might take a thought and mend!" So may the churches. There is hope: Dr. Briggs is teaching the stubborn Presbyterians the "Higher Criticism" of Paine; while the Pope of Rome is discovering that his "republicanism" was always the political doctrin of the church. The most obstinate turtles move when there is a coal of fire on their backs or in their rear. The fire of the human intellect they can resist no longer. They must advance or go out of existence. As they go on they will some day find that Thomas Paine was another doubting, but a far more useful St. Thomas than any yet canonized. The Catholic church has lately found out that the girl who saved France, Joan d'Arc, was a saint; it is thinking over the way to canonize Columbus, the discoverer of America—but he was a hard case—far harder than our author-hero, who discovered the United States. So when the Catholic church becomes really republican it must logically canonize Thomas Paine. It must do it, or go out of business as the real republican and true Catholic church! Then wouldn't the priests hav a hard time to swallow the lies and slanders they hav put out about the real St. Thomas!

Let us hope that the churches will go out of business before they reach that painful duty; that the Secular Republic, with its state, school, and university, will happily take their place; and that the terrestrial heaven, which Thomas Paine founded when he founded the United States of America, will take the place of the celestial myth.

Science and the laws of evolution indicate such to be the destiny of the republican world. His was the voice that aroused the people and indicated the way.

In short, let us learn from him to anticipate the glorious and inevitable results of the laws of progress; thus shall we be stronger in hope and in head and hand to realize them.

Wilson McDonald's first words were: "I wish I had not come here." He said he meant by this that the preceding speakers had left him nothing to say. But still he managed to make some good points. He told of his early ideas in regard to Paine; how, more than fifty years ago, he read the "Age of Reason." "For half a century I hav thought Paine the greatest man who ever lived." To illustrate the superstition which possesses religious minds Mr. McDonald related an incident that came within his cognizance many years ago. In 1843 a meteoric shower astonished and terrified the simple denizens of this state. In a certain neighborhood lived a man who had the reputation of being uncommonly "smart." So, when the "shooting stars" flashed a warning of God's vengeance into the quaking hearts of the rustics his neighbors went to this old man and begged him to tell them what manner of "signs and portents" these were. He came out of his cabin, and, standing under the vaulted arch of the skies, gazed long and wisely at the brilliant display made by the wanderers in space. Finally, he said: "Well, I don't know what it is unless it is that the devil has got loose again and he and God are throwing stars at each other."

Before concluding his remarks, Mr. McDonald exhibited a fragment of the original headstone of Paine's grave. There are on it, in one line the letters "INE", part of the name of the great advocate of human rights; next below is the word "SENSE", and still lower down the figure "9", all that remains of the year "1809." Mr. McDonald holds this memento as president of the Paine Historical Society, having received it from Capt. G. W. Loyd, who in turn had it from an old Huguenot lady who had rescued it from destruction or theft, the headstone having been broken to pieces by the marksmen and curiosity-hunters of the early days.

President Rowley described the location of the grave of Paine, telling of Cobbett's disinterment and removal of the bones of the patriot, and calling attention to the situation of the Paine farm-house. Then he said that he had been sitting in the chair in which the lover of justice had sat while doing much of his writing, and he held up in view of the audience a wood-bottomed chair of good dimensions, with back and side supports arranged very much like those of the simplest form of office-chair now in use. The chair was an object of great interest, and called out hearty applause for its erstwhile owner and the incomparable fruits of his herculean labors.

The chairman then read a letter of regret accompanying a contribution toward defraying expenses, both from Mr. F. W. Bird, of Newark, who was one of the first to giv form to the movement which has just culminated in such a splendid success around the Monument of Paine at New Rochelle. Mr. Rowley also read a telegram from a clergyman of Brooklyn. Here we giv the letter and the message:

NEWARK, N. J., May 30, 1894.

HENRY ROWLEY, ESQ., My Dear Sir: Inclosed please find my check for $13—$8 for sixteen tickets sold to members of the Newark Liberal League, and $5 as a personal contribution toward the fund for restoring monument.

I regret that my business engagements are such that I am prevented from being with you in person. I am with you, however, and with all those who honor the hero of liberty whose memory you hav, on this Decoration Day, assembled together to revere. How strikingly does this event demonstrate the fact that, while men liv but to die, principles never die. May we all learn a lesson from this, recognizing, as true altruists, that the great and good in the world's past history hav not lived for themselvs, but for others; this, to me, is "immortality." Dead, yet speaking, perhaps at first only in a whisper, but becoming louder and louder as the years roll on until the tones become veritable thunder. Such has been the evolution of science and truth.

Wishing the cause of liberty and truth, and all who are engaged in it, good speed, I am. Yours fraternally,

HENRY BIRD, President Newark Liberal League.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., May 30, 1894.

HENRY ROWLEY, President Brooklyn Philosophical Association; Paine celebration. I am with you in thought—the flesh profits nothing. FRANK E. MASON.

With one more contribution from the cornetist and Henry Rowley's benediction, the assemblage dissolved, the units wending their way homeward as the May-day waned, all feeling that it had been a good thing to be gathered together in the name of him who warned us that if we "giv power to the bigot of any sectary he will use it to the oppression of the rest."

At the meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club, on the evening of June 1st, Secretary Duntze, of the Brooklyn Philosophical Association, in thanking the Club for the assistance it had rendered the Association in preparing and carrying through the program at New Rochelle on the 30th ult., said:

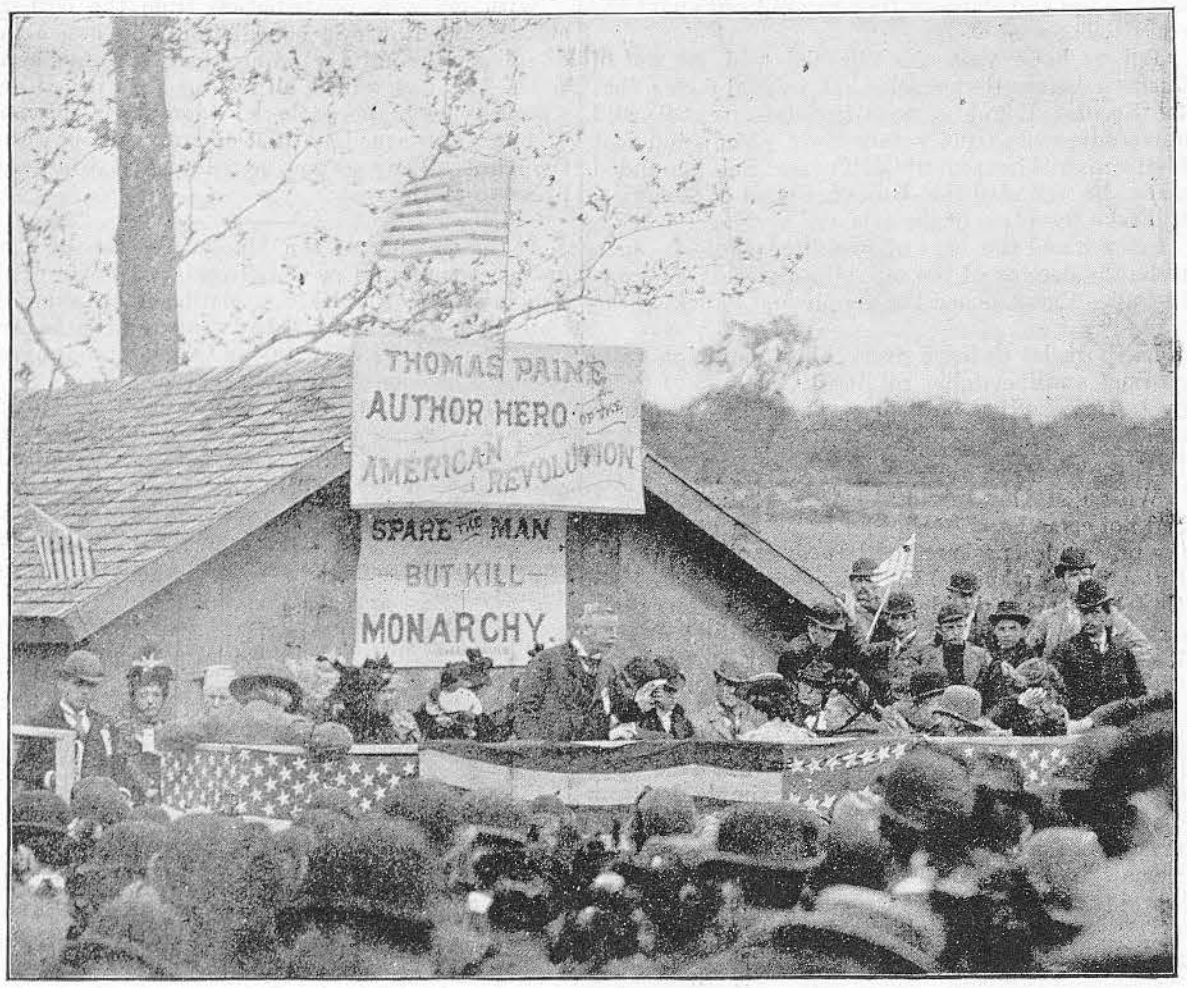
"The Paine Memorial was a success, friends. We are gaining ground. But two or three years ago, when Colonel Ingersoll delivered an address on the anniversary of Thomas Paine's birthday, the dailies published very sarcastic reports of it. To-day the Sun says: 'The world is making up its mind anew about Thomas Paine,' and never said the Sun a truer thing.

"You heard the telegram of regret read at New Rochelle, in which a Brooklyn clergyman said: 'I am with you in spirit—the flesh profits nothing.' Besides this I received a letter from a Presbyterian minister at New Rochelle, in which he says, among other things: 'I recognize that Paine did inva'uable service to our country, for which he has not received his share of praise.' This from a Presbyterian minister. Think of it!

"Thus we are marching on; and to still further educate the people with regard to Paine, I hope it will be found feasible to repeat this Paine memorial every thirtieth of May. It is desirable, aye, it is absolutely necessary, that the Freethinkers of America should be banded more closely together than they are to day. As Freethought, however, necessarily implies differences of opinion, we can not possibly agree on all subjects every day of the year. But let us hav one day on which we can lay aside all differences and join hands in fellowship around the monument of him whose memory we all honor and cherish, no matter how divergent may be our opinions on many subjects."

Mr. Duntze's excellent suggestion was enthusiastically applauded by the Manhattanites. It was no doubt the happy expression of a thought which had birth in the minds of many as they listened to the burning eloquence of the memorial day speakers, but which none but Mr. Duntze had definitivly formulated, and which it remained for him to giv utterance to in the "nick of time."

Paine's Appeals for the Negro and for Woman.



After the acquisition of Louisiana, the French inhabitants of that territory (in 1804) sent a memorial to Congress demanding "immediate admission to equal statehood, also the right to continue the importation of negro slaves." Paine wrote a characteristic reply. Conway quotes some terse sentences:

"Paine reminds the memorialists of the 'mischief caused in France by the possession of power before they understood principles.' After explaining their position, and the freedom they hav acquired by the merits of others, he points out their ignorance of human 'rights' as shown in their guilty notion that to enslave others is among them.' 'Dare you put up a petition to heaven for such a power, without fearing to be struck from the earth by its justice? Why, then, do you ask it of man against man? Do you want to renew in Louisiana the horrors of Domingo?'"

During Paine's sojourn in France a proslavery reaction had set in in America. An attempt made by the Virginia representativs to check the importation of slaves by levying a $10 per capita duty was defeated after a hot fight. "Franklin was now president of the American Antislavery Society, founded in Philadelphia in 1775, five weeks after the appearance of Paine's scheme of emancipation." Franklin's last public act was the signing a petition of the society to Congress against slavery. He died "twenty-five days after the close of the debate, in which he was bitterly denounced by the proslavery party." Conway continues:

"Washington had pronounced the petition 'inopportune'—his presidential mansion in New York was a few steps from the slave-market—Jefferson (now secretary of state) had no word to say for it, Madison had smoothed over the matter by a compromise. Thenceforth slavery had become a suppressed subject, and the slave-trade, whenever broached in Congress, had maintained its immunity. In 1803, even under Jefferson's administration, the negroes fleeing from oppression in Domingo were forbidden asylum in America, because it was feared they would incite servil insurrections. That the United States, under presidency of Jefferson, should stand aloof from the struggle of the negroes in Domingo for liberty, cut Paine to the heart. Unperturbed by the attempt made on his own life a few days before, he wrote to Jefferson on New Year's day, 1805 (from New Rochelle), what may be regarded as an appeal."

Since his return to the United States Paine had been activ as a newspaper writer. His biographer remarks:

"His chief anxiety was lest some concession might be made to the Louisianians about the slave trade, that region being an emporium of the traffic which grew more enterprising and brutal as its term was at hand. Much was said of the great need of the newly acquired region for more laborers, and it was known that Jefferson was by no means so severe in his opposition to slavery as he was once supposed to be. The President repeatedly invited Paine's views, and they were given fully and freely."

In one of these letters to President Jefferson Paine says that the best settlers for the agricultural lands of the Louisiana purchase are citizens of the New England states and the German peasantry. Of the latter he adds:

"These would be the best people, of foreigners, to bring into Louisiana—because they would grow to be citizens. Whereas bringing poor negroes to work the lands in a state of slavery and wretchedness, is, besides the immorality of it, the certain way of preventing population and consequently of preventing revenue. I question if the revenue arising from ten negroes in the consumption of imported articles is equal to that of one white citizen. In the articles of dress and of the table it is almost impossible to make a comparison. These matters, though they do not belong to the class of principles, are proper subjects for the consideration of government; and it is always fortunate when the interests of government and that of humanity act unitedly.

In the same letter the uncompromising friend of liberty writes of the Liverpool slave traders:

"I find by the captain [from New Orleans] above mentioned that several Liverpool ships hav been at New Orleans. It is chiefly the people of Liverpool that employ themselvs in the slave trade and they bring cargoes of those unfortunate negroes to take back in return the hard money and the produce of the country. Had I the command of the elements I would blast Liverpool with fire and brimstone. It is the Sodom and Gomorrah of brutality."

As Thomas Paine was the unflinching enemy of the slavery of the black man, so was he the foe of the subordination and degradation of woman. In the Pennsylvania Magazine for August, 1775, "is found the earliest American appeal for woman." Paine here puts into the mouth of a woman an eloquent plea for her sex, of which this is an extract:

"Nature assails us with sorrow, law and custom press us with constraint, and sensibility and virtue alarm us by their continual conflict. Sometimes also the name of citizen demands from us the tribute of fortitude. When you offer your blood to the state, think that it is ours. In giving it our sons and our husbands we giv it more than ourselvs. You can only die on the field of battle, but we hav the misfortune to survive those whom we love the most. Alas! while your ambitious vanity is unceasingly laboring to cover the earth with statues, with monuments, and with inscriptions to eternize, if possible, your names, and giv yourselvs an existence when this body is no more, why must we be condemned to liv and to die unknown? Would that the grave and eternal forgetfulness should be our lot. Be not our tyrants in all; Permit our names to be sometime pronounced beyond the narrow circle in which we liv: Permit friendship, or at least love, to inscribe its emblems on the tomb where our ashes repose; and deny us not the public esteem which, after the esteem of one's self, is the sweetest reward of well-doing."

One must be acquainted with the status of woman at that period before she can fully appreciate the timeliness and feel the force of this supposititious appeal for the simplest rights of a common humanity.

News and Notes.

I hav had a chance to "size up" the Constitutional Convention. It is a pretty slow-going body. It is evident that those elected mean to make the most of the chance to draw money from the public treasury. It began nearly a month ago, and yet the rules of order hav not been promulgated, not a single amendment has been discussed, and adjournment on the slightest provocation is the order of the day. The sessions will undoubtedly be prolonged until September 15th. Many amendments hav been proposed; but the following will probably occupy the main attention of the convention: The woman suffrage amendment, impartial taxation, no sectarian appropriations, home rule for cities, and changes in the judiciary system. Debates on these several questions will not take place at present before the committees.

I suppose the woman suffrage amendment will attract the greatest attention, since such a determined and widespread effort has been made. But I find, however, there is a great deal of thought in regard to the taxation question; and I am sure that something will be done in the right direction, though not so much as we desire. The injustice of exempting vast amounts of property is apparent.

Through the kindness of Mr. J. J. McCabe, of Albany, I was introduced to several members of the convention. I found some in favor and some not in favor of church taxation; but all that I talked with admitted that the present exemptions were altogether too vast, and constitutional limits should be established. The main opposition to the taxation of churches will come from the Catholics and Episcopalians, and from the city representativs. In the rural districts, even among the religious classes, there is getting to be a strong sentiment in favor of taxing church property. Many Christians say to me, "Get this thing before the people, and I will vote for it." Of course upon the Freethinkers rests the burden of getting the matter before the people, for Christians will not take an activ part in the initiatory work; but if placed before the people for their votes, I feel sure that a clear majority will be for impartial taxation. The rub now is, to get it through the convention and before the people. So far as I hav been able to judge, there is a very strong opinion among the delegates for church taxation; but it will require some courage to squarely indorse an amendment to this effect. But the agitation is started. I should judge that the Truth Seeker Co.'s pamphlet on "Church Property, Should it be Exempt from Taxation?" is already doing its work. A copy has been sent to every member, and there is evidence that it has been in some cases carefully read, and its arguments and facts will no doubt play an important part in future debates of the convention. It is the best ammunition that has yet been provided. A thousand copies hav been sent to the New York press in all parts of the state, and this will hav a very great influence; for if the papers, especially the country papers, are brave enough to voice the sentiments of the people in their several localities, it will be a power that the politicians will respect.

In this way the Truth Seeker Company's pamphlet will do us an immense service; so I hope there will be an increase of funds to circulate these cogent arguments widely.

I lectured before the Albany Liberals on Sunday evening, May 27th. The audience was not large, but a fair report of the lecture was published in the daily papers, and in this way considerable good is accomplished. I think on the whole our work is advancing in spite of the difficulties, the greatest of which is that Liberals themselvs do not realize what they can or ought to do. I must express my thanks to J. J. McCabe, of Albany, and Robert Wade, of Troy, for assistance so far in my personal efforts.

Albany is a pleasant place for campaign work. The stately Capitol with its imposing architecture givs one inspiration. The lovely landscape and river scenes about Albany, its elegant residences and beautiful public buildings, are quite attractiv. Besides, music and literature attend the way of the Secular Pilgrim. My brilliant and versatil friend, McCabe, occupies his leisure moments with an opera, together with philosophy and reform; and at Bath-on-the-Hudson my little Atheist friend, Marie Lumley, ten years old, is writing a novel which is quite delightful, besides writing poems for the Grand Army celebrations, etc. It is quite a relief sometimes to pass from the arena of politics, even though adorned with the glories of woman suffrage, into the bright domains of art and poetry. Here at least there is no bigotry, hypocrisy, or superstition.

The Paine celebration at New Rochelle was a jubilee indeed. Those who were not there will gather something of the glory of the day from the pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER—the oration of Ingersoll, etc. The Brooklyn Philosophical Association is to be congratulated on the success of its undertaking. Those who were present will not forget the occasion. It will be like a shining light on the pathway of reform. It is an indication of the sun-like fame yet to be of the author-hero of the Revolution. Among the historical associations which show how Thomas Paine was once regarded by the orthodox, Dr. E. B. Foote givs the following: John Bently, of New York, a member of the Liberal Club, was the son of a very good and pious Baptist, who, on his death-bed, informed his son, as an awful secret, that his grandmother was the sister of Thomas Paine. To be in any way connected with Paine at that time was regarded as a family disgrace, a sort of skeleton in the closet, but now it is an honor. It is pleasant to note that on this auspicious celebration day a great-grandniece of Thomas Paine was present. If blood will tell, as they say, it is fortunate that some of the Paine blood is circulating in the arteries and veins of an American family.

Representativ Durborow has introduced a bill in Congress for the opening of the Smithsonian and other public institutions in Washington on Sunday. This is a step in the right direction, and is a good offset to the national Sunday law. It has long been a matter to be deplored that the treasures of the Smithsonian Institute, so rich in instruction and entertainment for the people, hav been closed to the public on Sundays, the only day when the vast majority of the residents of Washington can view them. I hope that Liberals, so far as they hav any influence, will aid this bill. It is an opportunity for the letter corps to put in some good work with the representativs of the people.

I hope to see "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" soon before the people. Large bodies move slowly—and this is a large body—but it is on the move. The publishers are hurrying matters. I shall start on my western tour in June. I shall lecture in Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, during June and July, and then journey through Minnesota, North Dakota, and Montana to the Pacific coast. I hope, in spite of hard times, Liberals will arrange for as many lectures as possible along the route. There is no real reform without Freethought at the heart of it. We must keep at work on the demands of Liberalism.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

THE Milwaukee Liberal Club meets at Severance Hall, 421 Milwaukee street, every Sunday at 7.30 P.M.

MR. WAKEMAN ON THE PLATFORM.

"Liberty, Science, and Humanity—The Monument of him who embodied them and made them working and saving powers in the world, stands before us!"

EDITORIAL.

The following sums contributed for the purposes of the Freethought Federation hav been received: Paul Fisher, $1; Robert Thorne, $1; J. G. Kendall, $1; E. A. Stevens, $3; Rogers & Bro, $1 55; Walt Heugartner, $5; N. F. Griswold, $10.

Our twelve-page Protest against the two Sunday bills now pending in Congress sells for five cents; twenty five copies, three cents each; one hundred copies, $2. It should be widely distributed. The people must be educated that the Sunday tyrants may be thwarted.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 23d we shall present to our readers the opinions of college presidents and professors and county treasurers of this state on the subject of church taxation. Look out for that issue. It will be interesting. Order extra copies at once, that we may hav the right number printed. The price will be seven cents per copy, five copies or more for five cents each.

The Freethought Letter-Writing Corps will continue the bombardment of Congress for another week on the Sunday bills. Write to some Representativ or Senator from your state, but not the one to whom you sent your last week's letter. Stir them up; we want an expression of opinion from them and you will help bring it out. New York members of the corps will continue their church taxation work.

Miss S. Levin, of 823 Broadway, went out to the Paine commemoration and took a number of views, reproductions of four of which appear in this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER. There is another, in which all the speakers and others upon the platform are shown standing. There are in it good likenesses of Ingersoll, Rowley, Putnam, Wakeman, and many others. Then we hav another showing the monument wreathed with flowers and adorned with mottoes, as it was that day. Still another shows the old Paine farmhouse as it is at the present time. All these photographs are 8x10 inches and will be in place in every Freethinker's home. Price, 75 cents each, postpaid.

Taxation of church property is going to be one of the chief issues in the New York Constitutional Convention. The Times of this city puts it in a list as one of the four most important questions before the Convention, while the Sun, quoting copiously from our "Church Property," says that the demand for equal taxation has become "one of the vital questions discussed by the delegates." As we go to press on Tuesday evening we are not able to giv a report in this issue of the hearing before a joint committee composed of the committees on Charities, Taxation, Legislativ Power and Education, which will be held on Wednesday and Thursday. Eminent lawyers will present arguments pro and con. Help distribute "Church Property."

We hav had printed an extra supply of the TRUTH SEEKER of this week. Single copies will be sent for seven cents; five or more copies, five cents each. Here is an excellent opportunity to make Christians acquainted with the real relation of Paine to the struggle for independence and human rights, and with this journal as well. Our large extra supply of the Paine Memorial Number is nearly exhausted. We will fill orders as they come in as long as we hav any copies to spare, and subsequently we will send the issue of June 9th in lieu of the Memorial Number, and, as it has Colonel Ingersoll's address in full, with other splendid speeches and the illustrations, our readers will get their money's worth and will no doubt be satisfied.

Let every Liberal in the state of New York write immediately and often to the Committee on State Finances and Taxation of the Constitutional Convention, asking that church property be taxed equally with all other private wealth. This will be the work of the New York section of the Freethought Letter-writing Corps while the Convention is in session. Write also to the delegate from your district. If you can, induce your local paper to admit arguments in favor of this measure of justice. The members of the above-named committee are:

Milo M. Acker (chairman), Hornellsville; Commodore P. Vedder, Ellicottville; I. S. Johnson, Warsaw; Owen Cassidy, Havana: A. B. Steele, Herkimer; S. B. Jacobs, Brooklyn; O. A. Fuller, Wellsville: F. B. F. Tibbetts, Ithaca; C. R. Pratt, Elmira; A. L. Kellogg, Oneonta; F. T. Fitzgerald, W. McM. Speer, Nelson Smith, W. P. Burr, M. J. Mulqueen, J. W. McLaughlin, S. S. Blake, New York.

Three other committees sat with the committee on Finance and Taxation at the hearing this week on church taxation. The names of members of these committees who are not also members of the Committee on Finance and Taxation follow. Write to the delegate whose home is nearest you.

"William P. Goodelle, Syracuse; John A. Barhite, Rochester; D. Gerry Wellington, Hamilton; B. S. Dean, Jamestown; Charles H. Moore, Plattsburg; W. J. Montayne, Cortland; M. L. Parker, Lyndonville; J. M. Maybee, Livingston M.; W. J. Roche, John H. Peck, Troy; Peter A. Rogers, West Troy; E. A. Brown, Dolgeville; W. M. Mullen, Stapleton; Wm. Kimmey, D. P. Kerwin, John T. McDonough, Albany; F. W. Holls, Yonkers; E. R. Brown, Watertown; H. R. Durfee, Palmyra; M. H. Hirschberg, Newburg; J. E. McIntyre, Potsdam; H. W. Hill, Buffalo; Frederick Fraser, Salen; G. R. Cornwell, Penn Yan; J. W. Riggs, H. A. Powell, Mirabeau L. Towns, Brooklyn; A. H. Peabody, New Lebanon; C. L. Phipps, East Rockaway; C. W. H. Arnold, Staatsburg; C. B. McLaughlin, Port Henry; L. M. Mauley, Long Island City; G. L. Danforth, Middleburg; E. Lauterbach, L. A. Giegerich, Elliot Sandford, C. S. Truax, Robert E. Deyo, H. W. Platzek, Francis Forbes, Eugene Durnin, Thomas Gilleran, A. C. Hottenrorth. New York."

"Church Property" is now ready, and all accumulated orders hav been filled. The members of the Constitutional Convention and the press of New York state hav been supplied gratis. We shall also put as many copies as possible into the hands of other persons who hav influence to secure justice in taxation. How many copies are thus distributed will depend upon the assistance we receive from the working Liberals of the country. All Freethinkers who can should also buy "Church Property," and distribute it among their own lawmakers, editors, and thoughtful private citizens. We hav made the price very low for so large a pamphlet. Fifteen cents per single copy, ten copies for $1; fifty copies for $4 50; one hundred copies, $8; postage paid in all cases. Let there be this year in every state and territory in the Union a campaign of education. Show the people the immorality, injustice, and danger of the exemption of church property from taxation.

Letters of Friends.

He Rejected Superstition in Life and at Death.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., May 9, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. William F. Porter, a prominent member of the Liberal League, and who publicly celebrated the birthday of Thomas Paine in this city, was incinerated at the Philadelphia crematory on May 1, 1894. He died as he lived.

Yours truly, MRS. WM. F. PORTR.

Worth Its Weight in Gold.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., May 3, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I am a Freethinker, and hav been one for the past three years. Some time ago I had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Erwin Auffurth and for the first time learned that there was such a paper as THE TRUTH SEEKER. After reading a few copies which I got from Mr. Auffurth I came to the conclusion that I would become a subscriber, and I will say that I am more than satisfied with my investment. "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated," which I received as a premium, is worth its weight in gold. I laughed more over it than anything else I ever read. Wishing THE TRUTH SEEKER family a grand future, I am,

Yours fraternally,

JOHN A. BEHRMAN.

Not a Good Judge of Literature.

SALINA, KAN., May 12, 1894.

"A free press is the battle-cry of Infidelity," shouted Judge Perkins, of Texas, at the Southern Methodist conference in Memphis yesterday. Don't get excited, judge, smarter men than you hav let the heat under their collars consume them as a flame. A free press, judge, is not quite the battle cry of Infidelity, but it is the betê noir of every hide-bound, narrow-sighted, hard-hearted, blood-spilling fanatic, every inquisitor, every applier of a torch to the martyr, every man who has turned the rack, every bigot and every man-hunter since the printing-press began its glorious work. A free press has made it possible for men like Judge Perkins to sit in a Methodist council without being persecuted as a heretic and burned as an unbeliever.—Kansas City Star.

MR. EDITOR: Yes, and this condition of things was brought about by Infidelity and modern science. Grand men, like Thomas Paine, the great apostle of religious and political Liberty, and Col. Robt. G. Ingersoll, hav set the intelligent world to thinking. A. STOCKENBERG.

Wanted to Hang or Behead Her.

McMINNVILLE, OR., May 5, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Mrs. Katie Kehm-Smith lectured here Saturday, Sunday, and Sunday night in the opera house. She was a success. Her gentle appearance and mild speech made a center hit on orthodoxy, and all thinkers would be proud to hear her. The opera house was crowded Sunday and Sunday night, and I never heard such remarks as some of God's people made the next day. Some talked of hanging; some said she ought to be beheaded. I told them that the time was when they were guilty of such crimes; but thanks to men like Paine, Lincoln, Ingersoll, and such papers as THE TRUTH SEEKER, we had put a stop to it. We hav many Liberals here and could build a big church if we would only organize and hav a speaker to lecture for us every Sunday and organize a Sunday-school. I will do the best I can to aid and assist the cause of our church and the fundamental principles of Secularism. WM. T. BOOTH.

God in the Constitution.

CROOKSTON, MINN., May 6, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose translation of an editorial in Rodhuggeren, so you can get an idea of what we are doing. I will also add that preachers talk against us from the pulpit. That is a good recommendation. We succeed very well; our list is steadily increasing. OLE E. HAGEN.

Congressman Morse of Massachusetts has introduced a bill proposing an amendment to the Constitution acknowledging the Christian God in that instrument. What does that mean? A treaty with Russia is previously agreed to; can it really be the object to establish a Russian despotism in this country and commence a persecution—as is the fact now in Russia—of the Jews and the Freethinkers? What else can be the aim of this amendment? Is it in the interest of liberty? Is there anyone within the borders of this country who tries to interfere with the Christians in the worship of their God? We don't know of any. Nay, the amendment can not mean anything but persecution. Washington, Jefferson, Adams, and others of the founders of our republic were heroes of liberty and they would guarantee to all religious freedom by not acknowledging either one or another god in the Constitution, and it has worked well up to this time. We hav been saved from religious wars. The proposed amendment cannot find even an excuse by pretending to speak in the interest of liberty, for there cannot be found an intelligent man who doubts the fact that the only object is to establish a state church whose aim is to reach papal power and treat adherents of adverse creeds with fire and sword. Will the American people always sleep the sleep of indifference and allow religious impostors to establish a mental despotism and deprive us of the liberty we inherited from our forefathers? The money power has already overthrown our Constitution in regard to the country's finance and deprived Congress of the power to issue money. To make the bondage complete and bring the country down to absolute barbarism shall now even the Constitution's guarantee of religious liberty be annulled? Shall this take place? Shall demagogical schemers be permitted to trample the liberty-founder's monument in the dust and thereafter paint it with the blood of the persecuted?

Is Surprised and Indignant.

KIMBALL, S. D., April 30, E.M. 294.

MR. EDITOR: When reading the list of names of those in the different states who hav subscribed and paid for "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," I naturally, being much interested in this volume, wished to ascertain how many from this neck-o'-woods had ordered it in advance of publication. Well, was I surprised? I should say more—yes, quite impatient—to find that there were but three names on this list. Why, I am ashamed of my state when I actually know hundreds who are professed believers in Universal Mental Liberty, in Freethought. I know also that many of them are men of influence and means, in fact, are far better able to pay five dollars, the price of the book, than your humble servant is to pay five cents, for I am in the same fix as the old story goes—no place to lay my head that I can call my own and almost seventy years of age; hav to work out days for others to liv, yet once in a while hav a little to send for tracts and books for the benefit of those who will read and thus be enabled to reach light and truth and really enjoy perfect peace in believing. This you well know, Brother Macdonald.

When I was a member of the Christian church I often was sorely tried by members who were cold and indifferent in what we called the cause of the Lord and really seemed so unfaithful that I used to get discouraged, knowing the whole cause was kept alive by a few faithful workers.

Now, is not this the case with a great many Freethinkers? I think so when I see those faithful soldiers traveling over this country doing battle for the army of truth against superstition. I feel very much like repeating the old worn-out phrase, "God bless 'em."

Now, friends, let us wake up and make every effort that lies in our power to encourage by word and deed these noble souls who are struggling for liberty for the race and that "good time coming."

I see that Brother Steiner is to visit our state soon. I think, yes, I positivly know, that if the friends of truth would bestir themselvs and concentrate their forces at some point we might giv a mighty battle against the powers of darkness and superstition. Wake up, brethren, we are surely on the eve of a wonderful revolution; gird on the armor of truth and be ready for the fray. To the victors belong the honors.

JOHN M. MCKEE.

Ludwig Magenheimer.

SAN JOSE, April 30, E.M. 294.

MR. EDITOR: Last week I sent you a short account of the life of Ludwig Magenheimer. I hand you herewith a report of the address of J. J. Sontheimer at the grave. The funeral yesterday was one of the largest ever seen in this city. The addresses in English and German were by ex County Clerk J. J. Sontheimer and Emile Liess, speaker of the German Independent Congregation of San Francisco. I inclose Mr. Sontheimer's address. That of Mr. Liess being in German, I could not obtain it. The inclosed clipping is from the San Jose Mercury of this day.

L. K. TITUS.

ADDRESS OF J. J. SONTHEIMER.

FRIENDS: I cannot refrain from giving expression to a few thoughts on this sad occasion.

I hav had the pleasure of being intimately acquainted with our departed friend, during nearly a quarter of a century. I well remember the time when I arrived in our city, an entire stranger, and when a word of good cheer and a warm grasp of the hand by a sincere and well-meaning man, was a great encouragement. Louis Magenheimer was one of those who, unsolicited, extended to me both. He was one of those men to whom anyone, when in need of advice or assistance, could apply without fear of repulsion. He was ever ready to help those who deserved help.

He was a large-hearted and jovial man. He believed in and loved a rational enjoyment of life, within his means. But he found little pleasure in the good things of this world unless he could share them with others.

His hospitality, and the readiness and willingness to giv his time and labor to any project which promised a day of pleasure and enjoyment to his large circle of friends, are well known. He loved to see around him cheerful faces and laughing eyes, and he never was so happy as when, amidst the beauties of nature, his friends made the welkin ring with their joyous songs.

For many years he has given much of his attention to advance the interests of the San Jose Turn Verein. His efforts on behalf of this society hav been most unselfish and ceaseless. Having once convinced himself of the correctness of the principles which the society and the organization of which it is a part, pursue, he not only indorsed them, but did all in his power to place the society in a position that it might be enabled to successfully carry them into effect. The void which his death causes in the ranks of that society may never be filled.

In the prime of his days he was a painstaking, careful, and successful business man; and it is to these qualities that he owed the competence which comforted his declining years. And he enjoyed the satisfaction of knowing that it was all earned honestly, acquired rightfully.

With all that, he was a patriotic man, a law-abiding citizen. As such he has rendered the community valuable services in his time. And although he never forget the Fatherland, and rejoiced in its social and political anvancement, he nevertheless was a true American, and loved his adopted country above all. By his death his friends and the community suffer an irreparable loss. But it is the family that will miss the steady and safe hand that has guided its affairs. He was a true and noble husband, a kind father, and yet firm in his kindness.

In matters of religion he was exceedingly liberal and tolerant. "Let every man believe according to his convictions and according to the light which he possesses," was his motto. He himself was not a believer in creeds and dogmas. He believed that a man's life should be his creed. If that principle is carried out, it matters little what the sequence of this life may be, retribution or reward; in the case of our friend it can only be reward. Whatever his ideas in this regard may hav been, let us hope that his fondest expectations may now be realized.

A good man is gone. May his memory ever be cherished by his friends. Peace to his ashes.

FROM THE SAN JOSE "MERCURY."

The services both at the residence and at the grave were very impressiv, and were attended by a large number of friends. The spacious parlors of the family residence were filled to overflowing by people who had assembled to pay their last respects to the deceased. Many beautiful floral tributes were received. One of the largest and prettiest pieces was a pillow with the words, "Rest, Grandpapa," which was encircled by a beautiful wreath of flowers. Among the other tributes were a lyre of roses, a harp, pillows, a broken wheel, sheaves of wheat, and many others, including bouquets of various choice flowers.

The services and funeral were under the auspices of the San Jose Turn Verein, the deceased being one of the prominent members of that organization.

The solemn services were conducted by Emile Liess, speaker of the German Independent Congregation of San Francisco. In his address he spoke of the upright life of the deceased. He dwelt upon the principles of liberty which Mr. Magenheimer had always upheld. He was a patriot in Germany during the Revolution of 1848, and was compelled to leave for America with other noble spirits. The speaker characterized him as one of the best fighters for freedom in every respect, and in concluding he said: "He will liv, although dead, in the hearts of his family and his friends."

After the address the cortege passed on to Oak Hill Cemetery. The hearse was preceded by a band and the members of the Turn Verein. The funeral was one of the largest ever seen in San Jose.

At the grave the services opened with a song by the San Jose Turn Verein Glee Club, "Everywhere is Peace." This was followed by addresses in English and German by J. J. Sontheimer and Emile Liess, followed by the singing of "Farewell, Dear Brother," by the Glee Club. The Turners, then, as a last token, gave their farewell by saying "Gut Heil," and the grave was then strewed with flowers.

The pall-bearers were Franz Hauer, Henry Roehr, Conrad Roehr, Charles Doerr, L. Henning, Karl Klein, Hermann Reich, and C. Bortelsmann.

The Prophet Concludes.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., May 25, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Macdonald, in closing his part of our discussion on Finance, hopes that his opponent "will not take offense if he interposes no further argument against his position," and his opponent hastens to assure him that "taking offense" at lack of argument has been outlawed in Mr. Macdonald's favor since the beginning of this discussion, for the papers against the gold standard hav been destitute of anything more cogent than assertions, which, when attacked, hav been uniformly and heartlessly abandoned by their progenitor, whose duty it was to defend them or else to acknowledge that they were not tenable. Lest this characterization should seem to smack of unfairness, a brief summary of the case seems necessary, as follows: The main point of the discussion was the assertion that free coinage of silver would drive out gold, thus causing the necessity of adopting a silver monometalism instead of the gold standard, and forcing those who had accepted (and still held) silver while it was still exchangeable for one hundred in gold, to giv, at least, two silver dollars for an article they had formerly got for one, to the consequent detriment of all holders of both silver and paper money, in the first place, and of all classes of the people, without regard to wealth or poverty, in the next place, by reason of the inevitable stagnation in business which would result from the disordered state of our currency that would ensue. Mr. Macdonald has defended the negativ of this proposition by simply denying the arguments offered as sustaining it, absolutely, without attempt to refute them, which failure on his part to show their fallacy induces the belief that the reasoning was sound, or else that my opponent's knowledge of the subject under discussion was not commensurate with his desire to maintain a successful negativ. In the line of the allegation my opponent has said that the possibility of exchanging fractional currency for its full face, at will of the holder, although possessing in itself but a tithe of that value, is not the reason why they circulate at their face, and offered in support of this denial the fact that cents do not circulate at all on the Pacific slope, because such small coins are not needed, which certainly can be no reason why it should not be the fact of possible redemption, which insures the holder against loss, that makes them acceptable at par, where they are needed.

Again, when my opponent claims that a government note is redeemed when the holder pays it out in the course of exchange, it becomes plain that he puts a meaning on the word "redeemed" which does not belong to it, but which does find expression when "exchanged" is substituted; and that, by this misuse of the former word, Mr. Macdonald has succeeded in befogging his acute mind, and has rendered null all the "argument" based on that misconception. But to call attention to all the unfounded and unsupported allegations which my opponent asserts to be arguments, would be to rewrite the whole discussion, which, to those who hav had the patience to carefully follow the discussion, would be needless, and to those who hav not so followed it, fruitless; so, with what has been already said, we will leave the discussion, which has passed, to the consideration and tender mercies of those who can think if they want to, firm in the conviction that the opinions of those who only think they think hav no scientific value, and conclude the discussion by pointing out what, to the writer, seem to be new allegations quite as destitute of foundation as those others to which attention has from time to time been directed. First, we are told that "we hav a financial basis which is continually contracting, con tinually depressing prices, and more and more repelling investment and enterprise." If my friend means that gold is being produced in greatly smaller quantities than formerly, he has probably had access to some statistics not known to the general student, for those which are accessible tell us that the production of gold is tolerably stable. If he means that the purchasing power of gold is increasing—as it is—it does not necessarily follow that the change is in the gold; in fact, it is tolerably clear to those who recognize the principles upon which progress is made, that the introduction of labor-saving machinery, the establishing of quicker and less costly methods of transportation, and the adoption of more economical methods, hav had the effect of decreasing the labor cost of all commodities —including gold—and that competition among sellers has compelled a corresponding fall in prices, and that, therefore, if gold had remained absolutely stationary as to labor cost of production, there would hav appeared a still greater diminution in the selling price of all other commodities than is now the case. Therefore, if the foregoing argument is sound, it is certain that the rise in the purchasing power of gold is due almost entirely to the decrease in the cost of producing those things for which gold is exchanged. This decrease in price could not possibly "repel investment" nor shorten industry, for the reason that lessened prices induce wider consumption and thus tend to increase investment and broaden industry by increasing the demand for men and thus increasing, to some extent, wages, to the consequent increase (to the same extent) of purchasing power on the part of large numbers, from which it appears that our friend should amend his indictment; for if it be admitted that gold is unstable, it rests with my opponent to present some basis for the currency that would not fluctuate at all, or to a lesser degree than gold, for a basis of some intrinsic metal or other is indispensable, and certainly silver is not the metal that will fill the bill, since we hav seen it fall from a proportion of eight to one of gold, to a ratio which, to be in conformity with the market value, should be about thirty-four of silver to one of gold, within comparativly recent times. Finally, let me assure my friend, that while not a capitalist, nor to any considerable extent a debtor, I am decidedly averse to having such a condition of the currency materialize as would compel me to pay gold prices, computed in depreciated silver, and to receive in payment for the services from which my purchasing power is derived, the depreciated silver itself, uncontaminated by having been brought to a gold level, in spite of the fact that "some women do not favor female suffrage," and notwithstanding the peculiar taste which induces an occasional prisoner to refuse to relinquish his chains (which seem rather like the flowers that bloom in the spring, having apparently nothing to do with the case). In taking final leave of my opponent, I am forced to acknowledge that he has made as effectiv a defense of his side of the case as any man could who had neglected to make himself familiar with the most cogent arguments favoring free coinage. It seems to me clear that a reasonable amount of study of the financial question will convince my opponent that there is nothing for the masses—nor the classes—in the so-called cheap money, and that increasing knowledge and wider experience are constantly lessening the number of those who believe that bimetallism, free silver coinage, or an irredeemable paper currency is a "sure way to grasp a hunk of prosperity," and that, in consequence, the probability is remote that my friend will ever be able to point with pride to any nation which has re-established free coinage of silver at the present ratio, and by phenomenal prosperity thus gained, put him in a position to exultingly remark—after the manner of prophets from Gowanus or elsewhere—"I told you so!"

E. O. ROSCOE.

About Certain Organizations.

MR. EDITOR: At several different times I hav read in THE TRUTH SEEKER severe comments and criticisms upon the American Protectiv Association "and kindred organizations," in which you invariably associate the former with such as the National League for the Protection of American Institutions, the Junior Order of United Americans, Patriotic Order of Sons of America, etc. To make the parallel appear justifiable you quote from some state or local appendix to the general laws of the A. P. A., which is not right. As your friend Reynolds says, as to the A. P. A.'s, "you are away off." To do justice to the A. P. A.'s, you should consider their aims and objec's and principles alone, and not endeavor to criticise them by comparing them with Dr. King's League or the others quoted by me. The writer hereof knows whereof he speaks, and he knows that Freethinkers, Atheists, or any non-religionists are eligible to membership, and he knows that in this city an Atheist is President of a council. The American Protectiv Association is purely political, but by no means partisan, and therefore disclaims the control of the political affiliations of its members It is tolerant of all creeds, but opposes the holding of official positions, state or national, by those who subject the civil and political to ecclesiastical authority. Surely this is Liberal. It denies the right of any ecclesiastical power to control the education of the youth of our land, and is opposed to the Bible or any other religious text-book in our public schools. It believes in the total and absolute divorce of church and state. It is opposed to the appropriation of the public moneys for any or all sectarian purposes. It favors the taxation of church property, and demands that "all hospitals, asylums, reformatories or other institutions in which people are under restraint," shall be open to government inspection. It opposes the present infamous abuse of our naturalization laws, and favors the restriction of immigration to the better classes of foreigners.

The above is about the sum total of its principles. It is but natural that Catholics should oppose them, for that church stands opposed to all of these. Because the majority of the membership of the American Protectiv Association are Protestants is no reason why Freethinkers should not join the order, no more than Lincoln, when he called for 300,000 soldiers to put down the Rebellion, should hav accepted only men with blue eyes or red hair.

While I believe that all religions, and especially the Christian, are detrimental to human happiness, and hav brought upon mankind only misery, and that the Protestant wing of it would, if it ever got supreme control, effectually destroy every vestige of freedom in America, I think, with Mr. Reynolds, that I can consistently unite, even with Protestants, to aid in the overthrow of a power which, while it pretends to be a church organization, and so can the easier blind the people, is purely a political machine which adapts itself to the political conditions of the government in which it intends to operate, for the subversion of liberty and priestly supreme control, and one which all the world should unite to banish from off the face of the earth, that it may curse mankind no more. If, after this shall hav been done, Protestantism requires the same severe remedy, then it, too, must go, and mankind be free. Let us not deny the aid of anybody in this trying emergency.

RHADAMANTHUS.

[We associate the various organizations named because their objects are substantially the same, differing only in minor details. As we hav said, papers friendly to one are friendly to the others. Neither society attacks or criticises the others. If, as our friend seems to hav been led to think, the American Protectiv Association opposes Protestant religious instruction in the schools, why does it not say so in language which cannot be misunderstood or evaded? It would be the easiest thing in the world to do. Why does it not, through its papers and speakers, at least occasionally condemn the pro-Bible-in-the-schools attitude of the Junior Order of United American Mechanics, an organization which is coddled and advertised in most of the A.P.A. papers? Why does it not impartially antagonize all bodies hostil to the secular state instead of making a sectarian attack upon one alone, and that with weapons which no Freethinker should grasp? A society, no less than an individual, is known by the company it keeps, and until the American Protectiv Association says publicly, authoritativly, and with the clearness of particularity that it is unalterably opposed to the Protestant church-state schemes of the Junior Order of United American Mechanics, the National League for the Protection of American Institutions and similar organizations, we shall be under the necessity of considering it and them as practically one body, inspired by the same motivs, armed alike, and seeking a common object—the political ascendancy of Protestant Christianity.

We hav never disputed the fact that Infidels are admitted to membership in the American Protectiv Association. The society is undoubtedly more than willing to get all the pecuniary, moral, and political assistance that it can. But so long as that organization shall fail to align itself, by word and actions, squarely in favor of the completely secular state, the state which discriminates against no man on account of his religious allegiance or his non-religious affiliations, we shall know that it is not dominated by the principles of Freethought, no matter if here and there an Atheist does hold office in a local or even in a state or the national body. There is a vital principle violated when Freethinkers fraternize with Protestants on the sectarian platform of the latter; the refusal of Lincoln to accept for the army no men except those who had blue eyes or red hair would hav been an act of mere caprice. Speaking paradoxically, Rhadamanthus's parallel is not a parallel.

Rhadamanthus asks if the purpose of the American Protectiv Association to shut out of office those who "subject the civil and political to the ecclesiastical authority" is not Liberal. Treason consists in overt acts. Holding to a certain theory concerning the relativ obligations of the civil and religious authority is not an overt act. If it were, Protestant Christians would be debarred from office also, for they hold that God is the supreme sovereign of consciences. And the ethical philosopher no less than the Catholic and the Protestant believer holds with William H. Seward that there is a "higher law" than the dictum of the legislature. They differ only as to the nature and sanctions of that law. If all men who, under some conceivable circumstances, would subject the civil to the religious or ethical obligation are to be denied the privileges of citizenship, then no man who can feel or think, will hereafter hold office.

We are told that the American Protectiv Association "believes in the total and absolute divorce of church and state." So say the National Reform Association, the American Sabbath Union, the Junior Order of United American Mechanics, the League of which Dr. King is the secretary, and other similar bodies, but we know that the assertion is not true, so far as these societies are concerned. We know that some of these organizations are working with frantic zeal to make this republic a theocracy, and that none of them comes within a thousand miles of the secular position. We hav the best of reasons for thinking that the American Protectiv Association is not in favor of the absolute divorce of church and state, no matter how sincere Secularists a very small minority of its membership may be. If Rhadamanthus is right why does not the society place itself on record against the Sunday legislation of the present day? Why does it not send to Congress a thundering protest against the two Sunday bills now pending in that body? Why does it not demand the elimination of the Bible from the public schools? In short, why does it not do something besides inflame the prejudices of one division of Christians against another division of Christians?

Just a word anent the "foreign" business and the Rebellion. Of course we are getting some very undesirable people from Europe, for there are such people in all parts of the world. But it is perfectly safe to say that there are more earnest Freethinkers among our importations, in proportion to the total number, than among nativ Americans. And among nativ Christians where will you find so large a body activly opposed to the Christian amendment as the Lutheran church which has sent so many protests to Congress against that amendment? It is very foolish to politically boycott either foreigners or Catholics. Men are to be judged and punished for what they do, not for what they believe or because they were born in some particular place. Has our friend forgotten that the greatest struggle in which this nation ever engaged, a struggle for its very existence, was the slaveholders' rebellion, and that that rebellion had its seat in a section of the country where there always has been a very small "foreign" population—the smallest of any part of the Union—and where the Catholic church is weaker than in any other division of the country?

The talk about uniting the world to "banish" the Catholic church "off the face of the earth" (by shutting Catholics out of civil offices, apparently!) is very singular, to say the least, coming from a Freethinker. No religion can be crushed by political combinations. Much individual suffering may be caused, but "the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church." Freethought and science, the slow but sure processes of education, alone can do the work which Rhadamanthus seems to fondly hope the American Protectiv Association can accomplish. When a Freethinker talks in this way you may be sure that the atmosphere of the society which he is defending is surcharged with the baleful bigotry of Protestantism instead of being permeated with the healthful spirit of Freethought.

Of all the unsubstantial dreams of visionaries this that the Catholic church in the United States is about to seize the reins of government is the most preposterous. That church cannot do it without Protestant aid. It is overwhelmingly in the minority, holding in its allegiance only a fraction of our population. The leaders of that church are not fools, whatever else they may be. They are not going to beat their brains out against a stone wall by starting a rebellion. Let Protestants bear in mind the injunction, "Physician, heal thyself," and the secular republic will be maintained with perfect ease. Keep laws in favor of the common Christianity of both Catholic and Protes ant off the statute books and the Catholic church is helpless. It is Protestant treason to the fundamental principles of religious liberty that we hav to fear, not Catholic arrogance. The latter can do nothing except by alliance with the former. Of course if the relativ strength of the two divisions were reversed, there would be a different tale to tell, but we are dealing with things as they are, not as they would be if they were totally different. Not until Protestants trample the Constitution which guarantees equal religious freedom need we fear the Catholics. Tax church property (not merely because it is Catholic church property nor even because it is church property, but because it is property); keep the Bible and religious instruction out of the schools, abrogate all Sunday laws—in a word, STAND BY THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM—and the Catholic church will never wield the scepter of political authority.

Protestant cowardice or treason alone can prepare the way for Catholic domination. Protestants and Freethinkers hold the destiny of this country in the hollow of their hands. There is neither need nor excuse for waging a war of proscription upon a minority church. It cannot control legislation while we are loyal to the Constitution. Stand for the broad, vital, fundamental principle of religious equality before the law. Anything less than this or more than this is unworthy the traditions of Freethought, and is suicidal. Thomas Paine well says: "An avidity to punish is always dangerous to liberty. It leads men to stretch, to misinterpret, and to misapply even the best of laws. He that would make his own liberty secure, must guard even his enemy from oppression; for if he violates this duty, he establishes a precedent that will reach himself." Keep church and state separate, but do not ostracise the individnal Christian because you call the organization to which he belongs "political" instead of religious.—ED. T. S.]

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Waiting for the Boys to Grow.

Mother, in the cottage yonder,
Why into the future wander,
Wishing for your boys to grow?
Childhood's love is better, purer;
Of them you are ever surer
Ere into the world they go.

While unto your voice they hearken,
Ne'er a shade they'll cause to darken
Your young motherhood's bright sky.
Take each hour its store of pleasures,
Sure love's choicest, richest treasures
Round your babies' childhood lie.

Wait not for the days your planning,
All bright omens ever scanning,
Dreaming day-dreams for your boys.
Others, too, hav lost life's sweetness,
Lost their hopes in full completeness
All by wasting present joys.

Future's oft a strange undoing
Of the castles now we're viewing—
Tow'ring castles in the air.
So, fond mother, cease your yearning,
Taste the sweets you now are spurning,
While your babes are free from care.

Good Housekeeping.

Home Again.

The editor of the Children's Corner has returned from her visit to California, and is once more at her post in her own sanctum. She is confronted by a small carload of letters, manuscripts, and other literary matter accumulated in her absence, all of which will receive proper attention. The Corner will now be given to correspondents, whose kindness, patience, and long-suffering are duly appreciated. The editor of the Corner is greatly pleased with her visit in the great West, and will carry with her, as long as she livs, pleasant memories of the generous and large-hearted people she has met, who made her welcome wherever she went.

The best of friends must part at last, and it was with real grief I said good-by and farewell to friends at San Francisco on the 27th of April, when leaving for Tulare. Life is made up of meeting and parting, and Byron's

"Fare thee well, and, if for ever, Still for ever, fare thee well," rings ever down the aisles of time in tones of sadness and regret.

My way lay through the beautiful San Joaquin Valley, a sweet, enchanting road, through fertil plains, green mingled with the yellow gold of the attractiv California poppy, seen always and almost everywhere, and here also I noticed a beautiful white plume-like flower that had not before appeared in my journeyings. Cattle ranches and many horses and black pigs were seen, and one cannot help wondering why the pigs are all black instead of white. This valley appeared fruitful enough, but in some localities lack of rain has resulted in much mischief and dismay. It is said that the cattle are starving, and one owner of a ranch offered five hundred head of horses at a dollar apiece, rather than they should die of starvation. The day was perfect, the sky of a sapphire blue, upon which floated purple-rimmed cumuli, and just above the mountain ranges lay long stretches of soft white flakes, with projecting masts, like ships laden with masses of fleecy wool.

But it was sad to see so many tramps with all their worldly possessions in a pack on their backs, tramping over the plains in search of that which they hav a right to demand—honest labor. Their pay, when they get work to do, is meager; and their employers do not afford them shelter—they must lie down on the ground anywhere, but, fortunately, the climate is so mild no harm results from thus sleeping out of doors.

We passed through Fresno, a great raisin country, as you know, and a lively place apparently. The weather is generally very warm here; so hot sometimes, a lady told me, that, in washing clothes, while wringing one end of a sheet the other end would get quite dry.

After leaving Fresno we came into a blooming alfalfa country, where herds were grazing, comfortable and happy, unmindful of the lot of their less fortunate brothers on the barren plains.

California is such a wonderful country—such a varied and strange, yet fascinating country—a rich land of fruit and flowers—and fleas! O yes! the fleas must not be forgotten, for they are a part of the productions of this great tract of plains, of hills and valleys, of golden sands and startling earthquakes, of milk and honey, alkali and blinding sand storms. A dead horse lay on one of the arid plains and close by a dog watched the remains. Perhaps the two had been friends together, or, maybe, the dog was calculating on a meal from the decaying carcase. We cannot know, and the scene vanished as we came to a flowing river, near Kingsford, winding its way in and out among wooded islands, its edges bordered by graceful overhanging trees and thick shrubbery.

How do I like Western people? Well, I like them. Easy, hearty and honest in their greetings and hospitality, you at once feel at home among the Californians.

There are fewer barriers of ceremony and conventionality than in the East; and to the Easterner the simple, unostentatious ways, the absence of Mrs. Grundy, is simply charming, as well as most novel.

It is the same everywhere, in the palaces and in the shanties, except, perhaps, in some instances, where the inmates may think it aristocratic to be condescending and patronizing. There are always some who study to be genteel under all circumstances, as, for instance, when a family had for supper only bread and water and peanuts, they ordered the servant to bring the finger bowls.

A DAY AT PASADENA.

While at Los Angeles, or La Puebla de Nuestra, Senora la Reina de los Angeles, which, literary translated, means the Town of Our Lady, the Queen of the Angels [great name that], we went one day out to Pasadena, and really it is one of the most delightful spots seen in many a day. Pasadena is indeed, as its name indicates, the "Crown of the Valley." It lies in a charming corner of the San Gabriel valley, at the foot of the Sierra Madre range of mountains. As soon as you enter the city, you breathe the perfumed air, and it is easy to imagine yourself in paradise. The way to Pasadena from Los Angeles is through groves of orange and lemon trees, the trees laden with yellow fruit and dotted with blossoms, scenting the atmosphere for miles around. Mrs. F. D. C., of Yokohama, was with me that day, and arriving at Pasadena we tried to find some burros in order to ride to Mount Lowe, but not a burro could we find, so we sauntered around town, lunched in a bakery, where you can get four cakes for five cents if you take them away, and if eaten in the shop the price is five cents for three. We had great fun over the bargain, but decided to hav our cakes in the shop with coffee. We bought a "mermaid's cradle" in a store, and wished we might meet some of our Pasadena children in our rambles.

Fred Folsom, who keeps a fruit store in Colorado street, and upon whom I hope our Pasadena friends will call, gave us loquats, a new kind of fruit, at least to one of us, and directions how to get to Altadena.

What an enchanting drive that was, flower-embowered homes on either side, roses in profusion, orchards with the golden fruit peeping from amid glossy foliage, and fragrance everywhere! At Joe Madill's ranch we lolled under the trees, ate the different kind of oranges, and gathered a bouquet of orange blossoms. Then we inspected the Armstrong place, which is for sale, price $15,000, for handsome house and ten acres of fruit-bearing trees. A thousand dollars an acre is asked for orange bearing land. We decided that had we fifteen thousand dollars lying around loose we would exchange it for the Armstrong ranch at once.

We visited other orange groves, ate more fruit by the roadside until we could hold no more, and finally got back to Pasadena and Folsom's place, to whom we gave an account of our rambles. "Now you must hav a milk shake," said the proprietor of the little store, who was formerly a New Hampshire man. "What's a milk shake?" inquired my Yokohama friend, who knew about everything else but that, and who watched the maturing of that milk shake with much interest. Very reluctantly we turned away from lovely Pasadena, bearing memories of the sunlit day that will remain fragrant for ever more.

Mr. Smith's Opinion of our New Book—"Right Living."

GENEVA, April 9, 1894.

MISS S. H. WIXON—Dear Madam: I hav just heen scanning your book—"Right Living." I can hardly say too much in its praise. It is just splendid. I am so full of work I could hardly get time to look through it. You appear to hav thought of all there is to be said about living right.

WM. SMITH.

PELLA. IA., March 17. 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I read the Children's Corner. We hav nine churches in our town and only a few Infidels, so we hav no place to go on Sundays except to church and Sunday-school. I wish we had Liberals enough so that we could hav Sunday-schools of our own. I don't think it does any good to study fables.

The Methodists were trying to hav a revival here a few weeks ago, and the preacher told all to stand up that wanted to go to heaven; and a great many stood up. Then he told all to stand up who wanted to go to hell. Only one man responded, who rose to the hight of about six feet. And such a laugh you never heard in church. All seemed to be surprised; even the preacher was so astonished that he didn't know what to say.

Yours truly, EDITH FISK.

P.S.—We hav 2,500 inhabitants in our town, mostly Hollanders.

LISTOWEL, ONT., CAN., Mar. 27, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav just been reading the Children's Corner, and it has inspired me to write again. I liv on a farm about three miles south from Listowel. Listowel is a town built on a river, which, when it overflows its banks, floods the cellars. With a population of about 2,500, it supports eight churches and four hotels, while it has only two institutions devoted to education, the public and high schools. I attend the high school. We hav three very good teachers, Mr. Philips, Mr. Irwin, Mr. Treleaven. They are all Christians.

I hav a brother living in Montana. He went there about three years ago, and appears to like the country very well. I hav a brother teaching; when he was home for his Easter holidays he took away a number of TRUTH SEEKERS, although he has to read them secretly, or he might lose his certificate. I hav a sister teaching; she just started at Christmas, and she appears to like it very much. I hav also a brother and sister at home with mother and father and me. I am at home now for my Easter holidays. I board in town in the winter, and drive to school in the summer. There is only another girl beside me who is a Freethinker in the school. We hav quite a number of Freethinkers around here; while we hav some who see through the nonsense of the Bible, but are afraid to say so; while we hav a great many bigoted Christians. The lady with whom I board is a stanch Presbyterian. One evening I went to prayer-meeting with her, and sometimes I could hardly keep from chuckling at things the minister would say, while others were taking it all in. I even thought one man prayed for me when he asked God to hav mercy on those who had come to church for the first time. Although I hav lived here for sixteen years, that was the first time I was ever in a church around here.

In reading the Corner, I pay particular attention to the letters of George Remsburg. I think he is a wonderful writer, and feel sure that he will grow up to be a great worker to the cause of Freethought. We hav none of your books, although I would like very much to hav them. We hav all of Colonel Ingersoll's lectures, and I appreciate them very much.

The climate here is moderate, although sometimes in winter very cold and in summer very hot. We hav not had a very severe winter this year; we had about a month's sleighing before Christmas; but the snow all went away for Christmas and New Years, and we hav only had about a month's sleighing since.

I would like very much if you would send me your picture. I would like it if some of the writers to the Corner would write to me. Hoping to see this in print,

I remain, your friend in Freehought,

HESTER PICKLING.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

APOLLONIUS OF TYANA IDENTIFIED AS THE CHRISTIAN JESUS.

An important and remarkable revelation concerning the life and times of Apollonius of Tyana, the great sage and philosopher of the first century. It is here claimed that his life and teachings were appropriated and utilized by the formulators of the Christian religion in the interest of so-called Christianity. The plagiarism is made plain in this brief history of Apollonius, especially in view of the historical references and comments thereon. It is quite evident that to conceal the plagiarism, the name of Apollonius was suppressed.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

HAND-BOOK OF FREETHOUGHT.

By W. S. BELL.

Containing in condensed and systematized form a vast amount of evidence against the superstitious doctrines of Christianity. As a book of reference and aid to all truth seekers it is invaluable. Its classification of subjects makes it a hand-book. As Ingersoll said of Paine's "Age of Reason," it enables somebody in every village to "corner the parson." Its wide variety of subjects include all the disputed points between Christianity and Freethought. oth. $1: paper, 50 cents.

PEN PICTURES OF THE WORLD'S FAIR.

By SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

It is, besides being a complete Guide-Book, the best description of the Fair yet given—poetic, beautiful, accurate. It describes the inauguration ceremonies, gives the director-general's address, the efforts to close the Fair Sundays and the triumph of the Sunday-openers; describes the various buildings and what they contain, and is, all in all, the very best picture of the Fair that can be painted with a pen.

ILLUSTRATED.

A MAP OF JACKSON PARK, enabling the visitor to make his way around, and the stay-at-home to see where he went.

A BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF THE FAIR, enabling one to comprehend at a glance the magnitude of the Exposition, the greatest ever known to the present time.

Single copy, 25 cents. Five copies for $1. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

RELIGION A CURSE, RELIGION A DISEASE, RELIGION A LIE.

By Samuel P. Putnam.

Dedicated to the American Congress, of 1892, which for the sake of Religion, Stabbed Liberty to the Heart.

A work burning with indignation inspired by the Congressional act closing the World's Fair on Sunday—an act which practically united the government and the Christian church.

To which is added Mr. Putnam's address delivered before the Columbian Exposition Committee of the House of Representatives against Sunday closing.

Also the following Essays and Poems by Mr. Putnam, which have never before been put in book form: Orthodoxy; Freethought; Man, Not God (written for a Paine anniversary); The Statue of Liberty and Thomas Paine; a poem written for the opening exercises of the Silverton, Ore., Freethought Hall; Death and Life; The Golden Age; Shut the Door (a poem on the closing of the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia, in 1876).

The main essay in this work is one of the strongest arraignments ever made of the religion which cramps and fetters the minds of the people of this country. It should be distributed widely. It has been commended in the highest terms as it appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER and we hope every reader will buy a copy to lend his neighbor and arouse thought.

WOMAN: FOUR CENTURIES OF PROGRESS. By Susan H. Wixon. No. 37 of the "Truth Seeker Library." Price 10 cents.

The contrast between women at their best four hundred years ago and now is vividly related, while the cause of their subjugation is traced much farther back—even to the fable of original sin.—Dr. Foote's Health Monthly.

A noble address by a noble woman. It should be read by every woman and every man. Especially excellent to place in the hands of women who are members of the church.—Progressiv Thinker.

THUMBSCREW AND RACK. Torture implements employed in the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries for the promulgation of Christianity. By Geo. E. Macdonald. Price 10 cents.

A concise, graphic account, with pictorial illustrations, of the instruments of torture used by churchly inquisitors to convert or destroy heretics and Infidels.—Progressiv Thinker.

A description, with ghastly illustrations, of the torture implements of the times of the inquisition, which hav been on exhibition in this city during the past winter. It is human history, not creditable to mankind, and the only cheerful aspect of it is that we hav grown out of that stage.—Dr. Foote's Health Monthly.

"Thumbscrew and Rack" is another Truth Seeker Company pamphlet by Geo. E. Macdonald. This witty writer givs an account of an exhibition of instruments of torture he inspected in New York. His humor rests upon a solid ground of seriousness, and the pamphlet is one with a purpose. The letterpress descriptions are helped by grewsome woodcuts, and the reader who turns over these twenty-four pages will get a good idea of how Christianity was promoted in "the brave days of old." George Macdonald's pamphlet should hav a wide circulation.—London Freethinker.

"Abraham Lincoln: Was He a Christian?" is the title of a book upon this most noted question by J. E. Remsburg. Like many other of the leading men of the past, Abraham Lincoln was claimed by both sides—the Christians and the Liberals. The fact in this matter as in all other matters is well to be known. The fact that he was or was not a Christian cuts no figure in his claim upon the esteem of the people as a great man and a statesman. The greatest value of the book lies in the evidence that it places before the people that all that is said is not so and that everyone who reads should think. Mr. Remsburg argues that Lincoln was not a Christian and in his argument he makes use as witnesses of the members of Lincoln's cabinet and many others—a total of about a hundred persons. The book is strongly written. Truth Seeker Co., New York. Price $1.—Winona Weekly Leader.

It is made up of short chapters which may be safely prescribed one at a time, in place of morning prayers for those who hav neglected that custom, but if one were to read it through like a book, he might get discouraged. We all find preaching morality far easier than its practice, and even in the preaching there are more ready to talk than listen. This is a thoroughly commendable book, as it shows sufficient reasons for right doing without reference to one's religious belief—that there is abundance of sanction for morality aside from religion; and the only pity is that so few will read it of those who might be helped by it, but that is the standing regret about all good books. If it were adopted for use in schools there could be no possible objection from any sect or creed, and we should think it might be especially helpful to teachers who must do more or less preaching in moulding youthful ideas as to criterions of right or wrong.—Dr. Foote's Health Monthly.

It is neither invidious nor disparaging to any one of the women's names which constitute a brilliant galaxy in our American literature, to assert or admit that each has some marked trait or peculiarity by which the expert critic, or even the popular eye, can distinguish a special one from all the others. Indeed, to be a writer of original mark, requires a verification of the truthful axiom that no two human beings can ever be exactly alike, either in organization or training, and that therefore the brain out-givings of no two can ever be precisely the same. And the claim set up by the writer of these sentences for Miss Wixon is, that her characteristics of understandable plainness and affability are so marked as to readily distinguish her among the long list of able women.

In her writings there is no effort at effect. The stream of attractiv ideas runs on in limpid words that reach the heart and conscience of the reader without fail, carrying with them the conviction that the writer is in dead earnest, and is bound to win over the affections and the reason to join in the benevolent determination "to leave the world better than she found it." And in her latest work "Right Living," recently published, her strong proclivities are so marked as to make the book exceedingly attractiv, both to old and young. It is full as much as any of her preceding works a book for the family circle, and should be in the possession of every liberal-minded head of a family, at least.

It is judiciously divided into short chapters, thus giving the reader rest and variety; and although the chapters are in themselvs complete monographs, they are all pointing to the grand central issue of "Right Living." W. C. S.

"With Daughter's Babe Upon His Knee"

A new edition of that splendid prose poem, "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt beveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

Gems of Thought.

MAN is manlier for being something, not for believing something.—Investigator.

THIS country will not be a land of perfect freedom until it secures the disestablishment of all the political parties that hav thrived upon prejudices and plunder.—Galveston News.

"WHILE kings, in dusty darkness hid, peasants may send down their name to the world's end in vigorous brain and uncontaminated blood.—Saladin.

THE standard of happiness is infinitly variable. In all ages—among every people—by each class—do we find different notions of it entertained. . . . Could we compare the air castles of the plowman and the philosopher, we should find them of widely different styles of architecture.—Herbert Spencer.

THERE never was a book so sacred that it could sanctify a lie. All truth is holy, whether it be written in books, or stones, or stars; and all error is unholy, no matter in what scriptures it may be. Morals that cannot be defended ought to be condemned. It is not within the power of the sanhedrim, or the synod, or the ecumenial council, to convert bad morals into good religion.—M. M. Trumbull.

PUT not your trust in princes who offer a cure of souls. Finally they will rob you of all you hav. The natural leader will not seek to merge you in himself. He will aid you to open your own eyes, to use your own arms. The professional leader will impose his law upon you. He will thrust you right and left and up and down for his own purposes. He compels the principle you would mutually serve to play lackey to his personal power.—Horace L. Traubel.

WE still pray for a fine harvest, but we really consult the barometer, and believe more in the prophecies of meteorologists than in an answer to our prayers; Te Deums for victories excite more ridicule than sympathy, and we encounter the cholera by improved systems of drainage without attributing much value to fastings and processions. In other words, the old belief in the supernatural is so far extinct that it could not be restored without encountering some of the most vigorous beliefs of the time.—Leslie Stephen.

MR. LE GALLIENE leaps the final difficulty by exclaiming that "Man has no rights in regard to God." He shakes hands with St. Paul, who asserts the potter's power over the clay. Yes, but man is not clay. He livs and feels. He has rights, even against God. The parent is responsible for his child, the creator for his creature. The opposit doctrin is fit for cowards and slaves. It comes down to us from the old days, when fathers had the power of life and death over their children; it dies out as we learn that the first claim is the child's, and the first duty the parent's—G. W. Foote.

SOME birds hav wings immense and body small:
And when they fly the wings alone are seen:
Symbol of Shelley's verse; his wings were all,
And bore him to the sky's supremest sheen;
Yearning to be the empyrean's guest,
On highest mountain tops he could not rest;
And oft he was the plaything of the wind,
Hither and thither dashed, mad, headlong, blind;
But should not poets mighty eagles be,
That dare the tempest, and are ever free
To make strong winds obey the potent will?
Yet why regret the want of pith and skill,
Shelley?—Thou wast a being of the air,
And never shouldst hav known earth's food and care. —William Maccall.

IF we all sacrificed ourselvs habitually and always, the world would be so much the more wretched in consequence; if we all developed ourselvs to the utmost of our ability, the world would be so much the richer and happier. Universal self-sacrifice is a meaningless conception. If one person sacrifices himself or herself for the sake of another, it is in order to make that other the happier. And if the other too lightly accepts the sacrifice, there is wrong and injustice. Most often, indeed, we feel called upon to sacrifice ourselvs through some act of selfishness or wrong-doing on the part of our neighbors. Sacrifice is then, in itself, by no means a good thing; at best it is but a pis aller. It is forced upon us as a bad necessity by untoward circumstances. If others could be as happy without the need for our sacrificing ourselvs, we should all be gainers. But Christianity has so exalted the false ideal of self-sacifice as in itself a good thing that most people are genuinly shocked to hear it even called in question.—Grant Allen.

Not for Parsons.

A DUTCH doctor who has been making investigations in Java has found the cranium, thigh-bone, and grinder of the Pithecanthropus erectus, supposed to be the animal which comes between the ape and the man. He is recommended to take them to Brooklyn for comparison with Talmage.—Freethinker.

THIS came under my own observation forty-five years ago, in an old log schoolhouse in the backwoods of Ohio: The parson was sprinkling a large family of children belonging to a newly converted old sinner whom they had been trying to get into the fold for a long time. The children numbered about a dozen and ranged in age from eighteen down to a baby in arms. The eldest one was marched up first and so on down to the youngest. One boy about ten years of age had gone to sleep; the next youngest sat by his side; he was wide awake and when he saw it would soon be his sleeping brother's turn to be baptized, he put his hand on his shoulder and shook him and, whispering loud enough to be heard all over the house, said: "Johnnie! Johnnie! wake up here and hav your G—d-d——d head wet!" The scene that followed can be better imagined than described.—J. M.

SUNDAY TALK IN THE HORSE SHEDS.

(Old Gray comments on the service to his mate.)

'Tisn't so much that the Sunday harness never seems to fit,
That the collar is tight, an' the check-rein draws on this queer, new-fangled bit,
Nor yet that the pasture looks greener,
somehow, this sort of half-rest day,
That galls me most, Old Roan, but the things I hear the people say.

My shoulders ache and my knees are stiff,
and it makes me want to fight
When I hear 'em sing, "O Day of Rest!
O Day of Joy and Light!"
For we started late, and to get here soon
we had to trot our best;
"Welcome," now hear 'em, "delightful morn, sweet day of sacred rest!"

Now the parson's readin' the scripture:
"Remember the Sabbath day,
In it thou shalt not do any work"—
"Amen," the people say;
"Thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy cattle, thy ox, nor thy ass"—
Don't seem to exempt the horses, eh? So we'll let the lesson pass.
Can't you step over a little? The sun comes in this side—
And it don't say a word about the wife; I reckon that's why they decide
That Sunday's a day of rest on the farm from the labors of everyday life
For everything the Lord hath made—except the horse and wife.

Now, that's our hymn; come, wake up,
Roan, that means us, I'll be bound—
"Awake, my soul!"—sing louder'n that;
some souls sleep mighty sound—
"Awake, my soul, and with the sun"— that's meant for me and you—
"Thy daily course of duty run"—well that's just what we do.

"A righteous man regardeth the life of his beast"—I'd smile
At the parson's text, but if I did they'd hear me for a mile;
For I trotted the last ten minutes lame—
I'd picked up a hard, sharp stone—
An' could hear the old man growlin' because his seat was "hard as a bone."

"Could I but climb where Moses stood"— but half of them wouldn't climb;
They'd pile in the wagon as full's 'twould hold an' ride up every time;
If they had to walk, they'd do's they did when your pastern joint was sprained—
They'd say 'twas too fur and stay at home, like they did the time it rained.

I'm going to write a hymn some day, an'
we'll sing it out in the sheds:
"Welcome, delightful morn that pours
the rain upon our heads;
Welcome, the slush, the snow that drifts,
the mud that irritates,
The storms that bring a Sabbath rest to the cattle within the gates."

His voice was hushed, for the notes of song rose on the hallowed air:
"Praise God from whom all blessings flow"—thanksgiving, praise, and prayer—
"Praise him all creatures here below"— man, beast, and bird, and thing—
With the possible exception of the farmer's wife, who, having to stay at home to prepare a dinner of chicken soup, roast beef, beets, onions, roasting ears, salad, pudding, two kinds of pie, and fruit, for her husband, three sons, four daughters, the pastor, his wife and two children, the district secretary of the Home Mission Society, a distant relativ from the city come out to spend the day, and two hired men, and very little time, and not much breath, and possibly not an everlasting superabundant inclination to usig.—Robert J. Burdette.

THE HOLY CROSS SERIES.

The Popes and Their Doings. Biographical sketches of the most noted of these vicars of Christ and vicegerents of God, showing what they have done, and what kind of men they were. It contains very plain statements, in very unvarnished language, and the unmasking is complete, proving them to have been cruel, intriguing, and licentious men. Considering the rapid growth of Catholicism in this country, this book cannot be too widely disseminated. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Awful Disclosures of Maria Monk, as exhibited in a narrative of her sufferings during her residence of five years as a novice, and two years as a black nun, in the Hotel Dieu Nunnery, at Montreal. Perhaps not any anti-Catholic book published has created more excitement, and had such a circulation as this work. To counteract its effects the Catholics circulated a story that Maria Monk was "no better than she should be," but investigation disclosed that her "child of shame" was none other than the child of her priest-seducer. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth 75 cents.

Auricular Confession and Popish Nunneries. By Wm. Hogan, for twenty-five years a confessing priest. A revelation of the licentious practices of the priests and nuns in these religious brothels. There is no question that Ex-priest Hogan knew the truth of the tales of vice, seduction, and infanticide he gives in this volume, and equally there is no question that if the people generally knew of them, Catholicism would not be given the vast amounts of money now allowed it by our various city governments. Price, paper, 50 cents, cloth 75 cents.

The Priest in Absolution. A Review of the system of auricular confession, including copious extracts from the "Confessional Unmasked," from the "Master Key to Popery," etc. The work is a protest against and an appeal to every American citizen to examine carefully and thoughtfully a religious system so invasive of privacy, so powerful for evil in licentious hands, so fraught with danger to female modesty, to the ingenuous openness of youth, and to the freedom of thought, speech, and action. Price, paper, 25 cents.

IN THE

Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,

At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acnmen is unsurpassed, its eloqnence never eqnaled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

News of the Week.

BAD earthquakes in Venezuela.

LIVES were lost and millions of property destroyed by floods in Colorado last week.

THE General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterians has decided, by a small majority, against women preachers.

SPAIN is all stirred up over the death of a bull-fighter. As to the mangled horses and bulls, that is another matter.

OUR correspondent, R. F. Grigsby, has been nominated for Congress by the People's party of the first district of California.

THE usual number of labor troubles in Colorado, Illinois, Indiana, Pennsylvania, and various other states. Some lives sacrificed.

SENATOR TURPIE and Representative Strauss hav offered a joint resolution for the abrogation of the extradition treaty with Russia.

COL. F. C. AINSWORTH has finally been acquitted of all responsibility for the terrible disaster in Ford's Theatre building, Washington, one year ago.

THE Atlanta Constitution, having heard from Alabama, where the administration wing of the Democracy triumphed, has greatly changed its tone toward Cleveland.

DR. HENRY L. SCHELLING, of Brooklyn, was found guilty of vaccinating a sick man (supposed to be dying) against the protests of himself and family. Sentence was suspended.

THE international convention of miners, just held in Berlin, was almost riotous at times, but still a tendency to union was displayed The English delegates, however, were not at all in sympathy with the Socialistic views of the French and Belgian members.

GRAY'S Senate committee, appointed to investigate charges of bribery, etc., is still sitting with closed doors, despite the almost unanimous protest of the press. It is having much trouble with correspondents, who refuse to divulge the sources of their information.

THE House of Magnates of Hungary has defeated the civil marriage bill, and Premier Werkele has resigned. Bishops and courtiers voted against the measure which Kossuth had charged his countrymen to enact, and which the common people want. The end is not yet; the bill will be again introduced into the lower house, and the Magnates must eventually give way.

MAYOR HOPKINS, of Chicago, tells the pious meddlers, who want him to stop Sunday ball playing, that he was elected by the liberal majority, that he sometimes witnesses a game on Sunday, and does not think it is very bad. He adds that he occasionally plays ball on Sunday and does not think it has made him vicious. He says that he has not done so since he was elected mayor, as he is at work in the office on that day! Mr. Hopkins should be re-elected.

SOME deaths in Brooklyn, attributed to vaccination, hav intensified the opposition to compulsory vaccination, and assisted in perfecting the organization of those who are actively antagonizing it. Health Commissioner Emery makes this large claim: "I want one thing understood, and that is, that I hav the power to vaccinate every one that I see fit to. I could hav stationed policemen at all the entrances to these places [oil works, etc.], and refused to hav let the men leave the works until my orders were carried out."

KENNETH F. SUTHERLAND, justice at Gravesend under McKane, and who jumped his bail and fled to Canada when convicted of a minor offense, has returned and surrendered. Under new indictments found against him he has been sentenced to one year in the penitentiary with a fine of $500, and one year and eight months in the state prison. He made a written confession that at the last election at Gravesend 2,100 fictitious ballots were cast, of which he himself folded between 800 and 900. All of which was done under the direction of McKane.

THE Sicilian rioters hav received very heavy sentences. Joseph de Felice-Giuffrida, deputy, eighteen years' imprisonment; Dr Barbato, a conspicuous philanthropist, Signor Bosco, an expert accountant, and Signor Verro, a farmer, twelve years each; Signor Montalto, a lawyer, ten years; Picoto, a student, five years; Patrina, an editor, three years; Benzi, a merchant, two years. Beside suffering the long term of confinement, Deputy de Felice-Giuffrida loses his deputy's mandate, is disqualified for any public office and suffers three years' police supervision following his release at the end of his term. There was great excitement in the Chamber of Deputies when the sentences were announced, and that evening bombs were exploded in front of the Ministries of Justice and War.

A Journal of Freethought and Reform.

Vol. 21. No. 24 {PUBLISHED WEEKLY.} New York, Saturday, June 16, 1894. {28 LAFAYETTE PL.} $3.00 Per Year.

TRYING TO GET A SETTLEMENT.

The next issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER (June 23d) will contain a symposium on church taxation, participated in by some of the college presidents and professors of this state, a number of county treasurers, and the Editor. If you wish extra copies for distribution, order them at once. Price, seven cents per single copy, five or any larger number of copies, five cents each. It devolves upon the Freethinkers alone to make a square, unequivocal, nonpartisan fight for equality in taxation.

Helen H. Gardener's latest novel, "An Unofficial Patriot," is now ready for delivery. It is the best work of the kind that Miss Gardener has written, and should hav an unprecedentedly large sale. Price, in cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents. We hav also just received a supply of the only complete and authorized edition of "The Great Ingersoll Controversy." It contains the famous Christmas sermon of Colonel Ingersoll, the protests of ministers of various denominations, and the orator's replies thereto. Price 25 cents. "What Must We Do to be Saved?" can now be supplied in German at 25 cents per copy.

Mr. Putnam will start upon his long lecturing tour in a few days. The dull times make his stopping places a good ways apart and this fact, in turn, makes business all the duller for him, by reason of the great increase of expenses relativly to receipts, but he is not easily discouraged and will make a good fight for Freethought wherever he goes. He is cheered by one thing, and that is the flattering increase of interest in "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." A large number of Liberals hav seemingly just awakened to a realization of the beauty and value of the forthcoming book. The printers are now at work upon the first forms, the paper, manufactured expressly for this volume, having reached the right condition for printing. There is yet time, if you act promptly, to get your name, as a subscriber, into the last pages. THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year and "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" is still offered for $6 50. This includes old and new subscribers.

The Freethought Letter-writing Corps (New York section) will continue to write to members of the committees on Taxation, Charities, Education, and Legislativ Powers, of the Constitutional Convention, in reference to church taxation. Present to them brief, terse, cogent arguments. Write to a different one each week. Keep the matter continually before them and let them see that you are in earnest. If you can, induce your local paper to publish copies of the letters that you send to the members of the committees. Here is a full list of the gentlemen:

Mr. Milo M. Acker, of Hornellsville; Commodore P. Vedder, Ellicottville; I. S. Johnson, Warsaw; Owen Cassidy, Havana: A. B. Steele, Herkimer; S. B. Jacobs, Brooklyn; O. A. Fuller, Wellsville; F. B. F. Tibbetts, Ithaca; C. R. Pratt, Elmira; A. L. Kellogg, Oneonta; William P. Goodelle, Syracuse; John A. Barhite, Rochester; D. Gerry Wellington, Hamilton; B. S. Dean, Jamestown; Charles H. Moore, Plattsburg; W. J. Montayne, Cortland; M. L. Parker, Lyndonville; J. M. Maybee, Livingston M.; W. J. Roche, John H. Peck, Troy; Peter A. Rogers, West Troy; E. A. Brown, Dolgeville; W. M. Mullen, Stapleton; Wm. Kimmey, D. P. Kerwin, John T. McDonough, Albany; F. W. Holls, Yonkers; E. R. Brown, Watertown; H. R. Durfee, Palmyra; M. H. Hirschberg, Newburg; J. E. McIntyre, Potsdam; H. W. Hill, Buffalo; Frederick Fraser, Salen; G. R Cornwell, Penn Yan; J. W. Riggs, H. A. Powell, Mirabeau L. Towns, Brooklyn; A. H. Peabody, New Lebanon; C. L. Phipps, East Rockaway; C. W. H. Arnold, Staatsburg; C. B. McLaughlin, Port Henry; L. M. Mauley, Long Island City; G. L. Danforth, Middleburg; F. T. Fitzgerald, W. McM. Speer, Nelson Smith, W. P. Burr, M. J. Mulqueen, J. W. McLaughlin, S. S. Blake, E. Lauterbach, L. A. Giegerich, Elliot Sandford, C. S. Truax, Robert E. Deyo, H. W. Platzek, Francis Forbes, Eugene Durnin, Thomas Gilleran, A. C. Hottenrorth. New York."

Judging by the answers we hav received from quite a number of gentlemen of whom we made inquiries concerning the justice of church exemption we are inclined to think that the faculties of our institutions of learning and the officials of the state and of the counties sadly need educating in the fundamental principles of equity. If our readers agree with us to the extent of a little substantial assistance we shall gladly send out "Church Property" to a large number of influential citizens of tbis state, confident that some of them, at least, will be enabled by a careful perusal of that pamphlet to see the question of taxation in a new light. For local distribution we are furnishing "Church Property" at very low rates. While a single copy costs fifteen cents, ten copies will be sent for $1; fifty copies for $4.50, and one hundred copies for $8; postage always paid by us. And the fight should not be confined to this state. Even if no constitutional conventions assemble in other states this year many legislatures will soon be elected and it will be a good plan to sound candidates on this important subject.

A Step Toward Sane Action.

On May 28th Representativ Durborow, of Illinois, introduced a joint resolution to instruct the officers in charge to keep the Smithsonian Institution (the National Museum), the Botanical Gardens, and the Washington Monument open on every week day from 9 A.M. to 6 P.M., and on Sundays from 9 A.M. to 4 P.M., and not less than three evenings every week from 7 to 10 o'clock.

This is a step in the right direction, although it is too short. There is no good reason why these places should not be open every day of the week until 10 P.M., at least, and during the warm months they should be opened earlier on all days. On working days the early morning and the evening are the two periods when the masses of the people hav leisure for recreation and study. On Sunday the museums and gardens should be accessible until 10 P.M., if not later.

Too much cannot be legitimately done to afford opportunities for innocent amusement and education. Only stupidity and superstition stand in the way of opening museums, libraries, parks, conservatories, theaters, and all similar places on Sunday. Yes, there is one more obstacle, and that is the self-interest of a comparativly small class of gentlemen who dread rivalry in the business of supplying entertainment and instruction on Sunday. They offer all sorts of specious pretexts for keeping all public places except churches closed on one day of the week. They go so far as even to say that open libraries and museums are demoralizing, and they solemnly declare that such opening amounts to a "national sin" and that the people who so offend will be smitten with divers and awful "judgments." Of course much is to be allowed for the stupefying effects of gross superstition, but we are uncharitable enough to think that very many who giv utterance to these jeremiads do not believe what they say. The notion is so utterly absurd that it seems easier to believe that these men are talking for ulterior purposes than that they really think that it is wrong to gaze upon the beauties of nature and art and to read good books on a certain day of the week. We know that there are hypocrits in the world; that men in high places profess a faith that they do not hav and vote for measures that they deem pernicious, and this for pecuniary and political reasons. Knowing that politicians are often hypocrits, we can do no less than suspect that priests are also. But whether hypocrits or merely fanatics they hav no business to interfere with the rights of their neighbors. No one compels or desires to compel them to enter the Smithsonian Institute or the Botanical Garden on Sunday or any other day, and they must learn to keep out of the way of their fellow citizens who do wish to go to those places on the day or days that suit their own convenience or inclination.

Of Mr. Durborow's resolution and the great good its adoption would accomplish, Kate Field's Washington says:

"Congressman Durborow of Illinois is brave. Notwithstanding the action of Congress in voting to shut up the World's Fair on Sunday, the member from Illinois is the father of a bill to open public buildings in Washington on Sunday and to keep them open on other days until six o'clock. He is confident that the bill will pass the House. How he can be confident, considering the complexion of legislators, I am at a loss to imagin, but I hope he is right in his faith. Never was a big town so devoid of innocent and instructiv amusement for the people as our national capital; never was a town better able to present amusement at less expense. All that need be done is to carry out Congressman Durborow's plan, which this review has always advocated."

Miss Field tells how she went, armed with petitions, to the authorities and asked that the Smithsonian be left open until 6 P.M. on week days and opened on Sunday while she had a national loan exhibit in the chapel of the Institution. She was told that Sunday opening would be impossible, for it would establish "a dangerous precedent." She adds: "That was what I wanted." The conclusion of the editorial from which we hav quoted is as follows:

"Is it a wonder that lovely Washington is the least cultivated of capitals? Her people may look at wild animals in the Zoölogical Park on Sunday because they can't be lawfully shut out of parks, but morals are in danger if these same people are allowed to gaze upon the skeletons of wild animals, or upon books and manuscripts and pictures and patents on the Lord's day. They may at their peril take a car and go into the country for a glimpse of sylvan beauty, but they can't take a car and go to the top of Washington Monument, because it's against the law. Was there ever more senseless legislation? How can the illiterate improve, if the means are not offered them? Not only should the national museums be open on Sunday, but lectures now given free on week days to small audiences, should be transferred to the one day in seven when the populace could flock to them with pleasure and profit. Washington has a national Chautauqua that, with a little management, could be made a perennial benefaction. The way to empty saloons is to open art galleries and museums. If Congressman Durborow carries his bill through Congress, he will deserve the everlasting gratitude of the entire population of the District of Columbia."

He will deserve the gratitude not only of the residents of the district of Columbia, but of all visitors to the Capital and of all other sensible Americans. We are continually put to the blush by the dullness and slavishness of the makers, adjudicators, and executors of our laws. Most of them seem to be mere henchmen of organizations that are a thousand years in the rear of the men and women of science and progress, of the men and women whose ideas are in the lead in every department of human activity except those of politics and religion.

The Freethought Letter-writing Corps (with the exception of the New York section) will lend the Durborow resolution a helping hand this week. It is House Resolution No. 183 and was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, which is constituted as follows:

J. H. Bankhead, Alabama (chairman); Joseph Abbott, Texas; W. M. McKaig, Maryland; T. J. Campbell, New York; J. L. Bretz, Indiana; C. A. Cadmus, New Jersey; B. F. Grady, North Carolina; A. S. Berry, Kentucky; R. C. Davey, Louisiana; S. L. Milliken, Maine; Willis Sweet, Idaho; E. A. Morse, Massachusetts; M. B. Wright, Pennsylvania; J. M. Wever, New York; D. H Mercer, Nebraska.

Let every member of the Corps write, and those who hav not heretofore enrolled themselvs should do so now; they can enlist at least as "seven-day men" and women! But if they once enlist we will hope they may remain under arms to the end of the war.

Sectarian Appropriations in New York.

Last week the representativs of the League for the Protection of American Institutions argued before a committee of the New York Constitutional Convention in favor of the proposed amendment forbidding appropriations by the state to sectarian institutions. Some good points were made and the demand for separation of church and state rang out sharply but not clearly. The general statement was all right, but when details were approached it seemed as though almost every speaker was held back by a mental reservation of one kind or another.

John T. McDonough, of Albany, W. J. Roach, of Troy, and Mr. Mullen, of Brooklyn, members of the Convention, asked all the speakers questions regarding the meaning of certain parts of the amendment, and also tried to draw them out on related subjects. Ex-Judge Arnoux, of New York, said that it was as much robbery to exempt church property from taxation as it was to giv the churches money directly. He was the only speaker, according to the reports in the dailies, who took this position. Yet even his remarks leave one in doubt on some points. The proposed amendment reads to the effect that no money shall be appropriated to any denomination, society, or undertaking "which is wholly or in part under sectarian or ecclesiastical control." In reply to inquiries as to what this means, Dr. King, secretary of the League, said that it was a question for "a lawyer to answer." When Judge Arnoux was asked the same question, he replied that he was in favor of changing the phraseology of the amendment in that particular so it would read that no appropriation shall be made to any institution not under state or municipal control. This would make it clearer in one respect, for then an aggregation of sects, as the Protestants, could not take money from the state on the plea that their enterprises were not under sectarian control. But what about the institutions operated by the state or municipality? Will this amendment, even if adopted as amended by Judge Arnoux, prevent the teaching of religion therein? Does the League intend or desire to make the schools and other institutions absolutely secular? To the first question the answer is certainly "No," and to the second it is, in all probability, the same. What is the position of Judge Arnoux?

We hav all along believed that this movement was in the interest of Protestantism as against both Catholicism and secularism. That is still our opinion. There are almost numberless indications which point to the conclusion that the League for the Protection of American Institutions is doing all it can to strengthen the Protestant hold on the public schools and other state and national institutions. In his speech before the committee at Albany Dr. King said:

"James G. Blaine introduced in the House a proposed amendment of a similar nature, which was adopted by an overwhelming vote, and it was lost in the Senate by a narrow margin, failing to receive the necessary two-thirds vote."

No doubt the League's amendment and the amendment which was defeated in the Senate are similar in spirit and purpose, and Dr. King's admission that they are makes us all the more suspicious of the League. Why? Because the Edmunds resolution provided for the perpetual use of the Bible in the public schools. The Blaine resolution and the Edmunds resolution were very different, in the wording, and yet Dr. King seems to consider them essentially one. He evidently thinks that the latter expressed what is only implied, or tacitly understood to be, in the proposed amendment to the Constitution of New York. The Edmunds resolution, which lacked only two votes of receiving the requisite two-thirds majority, contained this proviso:

"This article shall not be construed to prohibit the reading of the Bible in any school or institution, and it shall not hav the effect to impair the rights of property already vested."

The rest of the Edmunds resolution, chiefly dealing directly with the educational question, read as follows:

"No state shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, and no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office of public trust under any state. No public property, and no public revenue of, nor any loan of credit by or under, the authority of the United States, or any state, territory, district, or municipal corporation, shall be appropriated to, or made, or used for, the support of any school, educational or other institution, under the control of any religious or anti-religious organization, or wherein the particular creed or tenets of any religious or anti-religious sect, organization, or denomination, shall be taught. And no such particular creed or tenet shall be read or taught in any school or institution supported in whole or in part by such revenue or loan of credit; and no such appropriation or loan of credit shall be made to any religious or anti-religious sect, organization, or denomination, or promote its interests or tenets."

This reads fairly enough, when taken alone, to deceive the very elect of Freethought, but when the proviso quoted above it is subjoined, the Protestant game is very plainly seen.

Here is the League's amendment now before the Constitutional Convention:

"No law shall be passed respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, nor shall the state or any county, city, town, village, or other civil division, use its property or credit, or any money raised by taxation or otherwise, or authorize either to be used for the purpose of founding, maintaining, or aiding, by appropriation, payment for services, expenses, or in any other manuer, any church, religious denomination, or religious society, or any institution, society, or any undertaking which is wholly or in part under sectarian or ecclesiastical control."

Dr. King, of the League, says that the Edmunds resolution, which, of course, includes the very important Bible-in-the-schools proviso, is of a "similar nature" to the amendment he and his society are championing. This is very significant. There can be no doubt that the League for the Protection of American Institutions no more intends its amendment to shut the Bible out of the public schools of New York than Senator Edmunds intended his resolution to shut the Bible out of the schools of the United States. Edmunds' defeat has merely taught the Protestant schemers to be more adroit. It has not changed their purpose.

Mr. W. A. Butler, one of the Board of Managers of the League, showed plainly in his speech before the committee that he was jealous of the Catholics, but he did not reveal that he had a clear comprehension of the basic principles of religious liberty. He said that he did not object to the Catholic church getting a share of the state funds, so long as the people did not object. But he wanted a fair chance. Exactly; he is willing that religion shall be propagated by taxation if his church gets its per capita share. That is secularization with a vengeance. He is willing that the churches shall receive subsidies from the state if "the people" do not object, which means that if the spoils are divided fairly among the different religious grabbers he does not care how much is taken from those who do not adhere to any church. In other words, he is willing that the majority shall rob the minority if the majority (euphemistically, "the people") is willing!

The Right Rev. William C. Doane was the next speaker. In answer to a question he said that he was opposed to the taxation of church property. That is, to state his position correctly, he is not willing to frankly vote a sum from the state treasury for any particular church, but he has no objection to having sums of money given to all churches by the indirect but no less effectiv method of tax exemption. How logical and just!

Rev. George E. Baker declared that to build up one denomination at the expense of others was a clear violation of the principles of the Constitution. Undoubtedly, but is the injustice less or the violation of the Constitution more venial when Christianity as a whole is built up at the expense of the Jews, the Freethinkers, and the indifferent?

When Col. J. T. Morgan was asked by Mr. Mullen why the public schools should be opened with Protestant forms of worship, and whether any form should be used, Colonel Morgan answered that "such a form should be used as the patrons of the institutions required." Which patrons? The Protestants? The Catholics? The Freethinkers? The Jews? The Methodists? The Quakers? The Latter-Day Saints? What does Colonel Morgan think of the suggestion that no form be used, that the curriculum include only scientific studies, leaving to parents and voluntary associations the inculcation of religious or anti-religious doctrins and ideas?

The Gallinger-Morse District of Columbia Sunday bill is in the hands of a sub-committee of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The Art Association of Indianapolis recently decided to open its doors on Sunday, and free of admission charges. Whereupon Rev. H. N. Hyde, its president, resigned, saying that public opinion was with him. But he must hav been mistaken, as on the first open Sunday, May 21st, not less than twelve hundred people visited the place.

A twelve-page protest against the Sunday bills offered in Congress by Kyle, Johnson, Gallinger, and Morse will be sent for five cents Twenty five copies, three cents each; one hundred copies, $2.

A Florida paper pertinently suggests that the mother whose child has prayed in vain to God for release from the spoiler's hand must hav her faith in the power of prayer sadly shaken. And her faith may be still more weakened if she has sufficient strength of brain to realize that God—if he exists—created the spoiler and the child for the express purpose of playing together the parts of destroyer and victim.

Katie Kehm Smith's report of the progress of educativ work in Oregon is very encouraging. At present that state is in the lead, but we hope that the Freethinkers all over the country will emulate the example of the Oregonians and establish lecture circuits and Sunday-schools. We must spread the truths of science, sow the seeds of liberty, and help establish justice, thus banishing darkness, superstition, barbarism, and cruelty.

Now the Quakers are taking their turn at denouncing Sunday newspapers. The New York yearly meeting has thundered its anathema—as the spirit moved, no doubt. About eighty-five years ago the Quakers of New York refused to the body of Thomas Paine a resting-place in their burying ground. But the memory of the great advocate of justice livs and his noble fame widens and strengthens as the years lengthen and the creeds grow weak and totter into the shadows of hastening oblivion. The Sunday newspaper is far from being what it should be, but the poorest is more entertaining and instructiv than a sermon, and has nothing to fear in fair competition with the pulpit, Quaker, Catholic, or Presbyterian.

The combination of the religious with the secular is always fraught with inconvenience, ill-nature, and danger. A new law in France requires church accounts to be audited by prefects. The Archbishop of Lyons commanded church councils in his diocese to disobey the law. Then the cabinet suspended the Archbishop's salary and the Council of State is asked to annul the pastoral. All this comes of union of church and state. The Christian gentlemen in the United States who are so eager to make the two practically one, so far as the regulation of labor, recreation, and morals are concerned, are likely, if they succeed, to find themselvs subjected to many annoying regulations by the government whose aid in the work of extirpating heresy they are so anxious to secure.

It would be money in the pocket of even religious editors if they would make a closer acquaintance with facts before putting pen to paper. Here is the Catholic Review, criticising Colonel Ingersoll's address at New Rochelle, and in the course of its remarks making this awful "break:"

"It would take more than the mere word of Mr. Ingersoll to make it credible that an obscure lower-class Englishman, a reviler of the Christian religion, a person spoken of commonly as 'an Infidel,' could hav put a 'flame' into the hearts of Irish and Scotch Presbyterians who always in those days themselvs burned with unrelenting hatred of England. Tom Paine was disliked by the Tories both because he was an Infidel and because, being an Englishman, he took sides against the mother country."

Paine could not very well hav been disliked by the Tories during the Revolution because of his Infidelity, for the reason that no one then knew that he was an Infidel, and perhaps he did not know it himself, for it was not until ten years after the close of the Revolution that he wrote his first heretical book, the "Age of Reason." So our contemporary will see that in his work for independence he did not hav the reputation of "a reviler of the Christian religion" to handicap him. The editor of the Catholic Review should read Conway's "Life of Paine," or, if he has not time for that, let him peruse THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 2d, and he will see that for Paine's services in the great conflict he has something "more than the mere word of Mr. Ingersoll," although that evidence in itself is not at all bad.

"There is a movement in Chicago to hav Sunday services in the various theaters, specially lectures with a stereopticon on the life of Christ, and prominent persons are considering topics along this line. A special list of slides is to be prepared by the St. Andrew Brotherhood. The object of this is to gather the large number of people who on Sunday will not go to a church, but are ready to enter a theater."—Independent.

Whew! Now what will the Sabbatarians do? When this thing becomes fashionable the theaters will be permitted to present the Passion Play, and soon church and theater will merge into one unnamable aggregation; buskin and Bible will be cheek by jowl, the preacher will cease to make faces at the actor, and the actor can be buried from the church. Maybe, too, this combination will relieve the theaters of the burdens of taxation! Of course the newspapers will send their best critics to the performances, and will make all they can out of the new development, but this rivalry may be bad for the Sunday papers. They may find the theater-church or church-theater a lively rival. What a barnstorming troupe that will be which can tour the provinces with Talmage as the "star"! But we forbear; the subject is becoming painful.

Jenkin Lloyd Jones with his new creedless church furnishes the editor of the Catholic Review with food for misfit merriment. A church building to cost $200,000 is contemplated. "It will be eight stories high, and contain bath-rooms, gymnasium, and reading-rooms." The Review comments:

"His is no longer a religion of the supernatural, but a religion of the bathroom and the gymnasium. He will cultivate not the souls but the bodies of his congregation."

That is what we call common sense. Good for Mr. Jones! This world is natural, not supernatural. We are living in this natural world, not in a supernatural realm. Why, then should not our religion be a natural instead of a supernatural one? Baths in clean water will not hurt us; gymnastic exercise is good, and reading-rooms will help drive superstition out of our minds. We don't think that the Catholic Review will succeed in making all Catholics fear and hate Jenkin Lloyd Jones and his church by this description of the latter. They may think, some of them, that well-washed, well-trained bodies and cultivated minds cannot be so very antagonistic to decent "souls." The St. Simeon Stylites are not so popular, even among Catholics, as they once were.

State Senator Bradley of the Lexow Investigating Committee disguised himself last Sunday and went nosing about the Bowery to see what places were open. Of course he was shocked, and equally of course he is going to introduce a bill. He found that the Bowery on a Sunday is "just about as it is any other day," and he informs us that he "don't believe in that sort of business." Hence the "bill" that is to be. That is the way with all these impudent fellows. They are determined to make everybody else do as they "believe." "If the stores in New York," solemnly avers Senator Bradley, "keep open on Sunday the way they are the city will soon be no better than Chicago, where you can't tell Sunday from the Fourth of July." Let us weep! Said the reporter: "But your tobacco store is kept open on Sunday, Senator." To which the virtuous Senator replied:

"Right you are. But I am ready and willing to shut it up. I hav always wanted to, but there is an old Quaker across the street here who won't shut up, and my boys don't like to see their old customers and friends going over to his place. Shut them all up, all but drug stores and restaurants. That is the way to do."

"That is the way to do," of course. Don't let your neighbor do anything you don't want to do. Knock down and hustle into jail the first man who would suggest so "unamerican" a thing as minding your own business. What right has a man to do what his neighbor disapproves? The saintly Senator Bradley is pious enough to desire to injure his rival's business, but he is not pious enough to observe Sunday unless he is paid for it. He wishes Sunday business stopped, but not badly enough to lose his own profits on Sunday sales. Bradley, of course, wants Sunday theaters closed. "Six days a week is enough for singing and dancing," he chatters. How does he know? Perhaps there are some who do not get time for that recreation on other days or who prefer Sunday. In conclusion, he says he learned much by his Bowery trip. He does not seem to hav added to his supply of common sense, while his ideas of freedom and fair play could hardly be more confused.

In the American, a prominent American Pro tectiv Association paper, published in Omaha, we find (issue of May 25) the editorial paragraph which is reproduced below. The italics are ours.

"The Romans claim that our schools are Godless. If Rome had kept her hands off, the Bible would hav continued in the schools and would hav wielded great influence for good. No body is a Godly church that will fight the Bible."

We hope that Brothers Reynolds and Rhadamanthus will let their eyes rest for a moment on this excerpt. Is this, then, the secret of the present concerted Protestant attack upon Rome? Do they indeed hate her so because her attitude upon education is forcing the Bible out of the public schools? A pretty little sectarian quarrel, is it not, but how can Freethinkers become the allies of either faction? Both wings of the Christian army abominate "Godless," that is, secular schools, and each charges the other with being responsible for the fact that less religion is taught in the schools than each desires to hav inculcated there. They are frantically calling one another all kinds of hard names, because our school system is partially what the American theory of government demands that it should be. We should rejoice that they hav such a fact to quarrel about, but we cannot afford to trail the Freethought banner in the dust as the camp followers of either contingent. We respectfully suggest that Mr. Reynolds and Rhadamanthus carefully review the successiv steps by which they hav reached their present position.

Freethought Progress.

A new Freethought society has been formed at Molenbeek-Saint-Jean, in Belgium.

The Grand Orient of Argentina has begun the publication of a new Freethought journal, Giordano Bruno. We bid our new contemporary a hearty welcome.

The Christians in Sweden are jubilant owing to Viktor Lennstrand's illness, expecting as they do that he will never be able to take the offensiv again. Once before they indulged in such hopes, but were disappointed, and we are happy to state that the indications now are that they will be once more.

Las Dominicales of March 30th contains a portrait and an excellent biography of Dr. Ludwig Büchner, author of "Force and Matter." The article is written by Odón de Buin, the great Spanish Scientist and Freethinker. ∴∴ The subscription for a mounment in honor of Ramon Chiés has now reached the sum of 3,044.25 pesetas.

In the colony of Victoria the ministers succeeded in getting a grant of $250,000 a year for religious services, but there were so many denominational claimants for it that it was made less year by year, and finally dwindled to nothing. As it had to be divided among all sects the Jews got some and then the Chinese made a demand. This was too much for the clerics. The more sects the better, is one lesson of this.

Since the establishment of the secular French republic after the fall of MacMahon there hav been established several municipal free libraries in Paris. According to the statistics of the year 1893 the number of volumes they contain aggregates over 250,000. In the budget of the city of Paris these libraries were debited with 209,400 francs, of which 116,550 francs were for the purchase of volumes, etc., and 92,850 francs for salaries, etc. ∴∴ The French Freethought Federation held its annual congress at Paris March 25. ∴∴ The French Freethought society of Mans has added thirty-six names to its membership list since October, 1893.

The Supreme Court of Nebraska has decided that a church corporation must pay taxes upon its property when not actually used for purposes of worship. Even if it puts aside its rentals for the purpose of building a church it must pay taxes upon the rented property. ∴∴ On April 23d Judge James P. Platt read before the Captain Couch branch of the Sons of the American Revolution. at Meriden, Conn., a paper eulogistic of the services of Thomas Paine in the Revolution. ∴∴ So far as heard from through protests to Congress, the Lutherans are solid against the Christian amendment. The theocrats, however, claim that many and influential Lutherans are with them. If so, they hav failed to make a showing in the Congressional Record. The Jews also, wherever heard from, antagonize the designs of the Covenanters. ∴∴ Secular Thought says that the Toronto City Council will hereafter send all patients to the Toronto General and Homeopathic hospitals, and will discontinue all grants to the St. Michael's (Catholic) and the St. John's (Church of England) hospitals. ∴∴ The American-Scandinavian paper, Rodhuggeren is a bright and lively weekly. It contains several well-written Freethought articles.

Mrs. Frederika Macdonald, author of that capital Freethought romance, "Nathaniel Vaughan, or Priest and Man," is lecturing in England to large and appreciativ audiences. ∴∴ Says the London Freethinker: "Scotland is getting less Puritanical. Dances and dramatic entertainments in church halls are becoming quite common. In the Church of St. Mary Magdalene, Dundee, 'there is a minstrel troupe in connection with the congregation.' In Forfar, the guild in St. John's Church brought their sessions to a close with a dance. In the hall of old St. Paul's, Edinburgh, a concert is about to be given followed by a dramatic sketch entitled 'Aunt Matilda.'" ∴∴ Now we hav a namesake in London. It is a sixteen page (including cover) monthly; is "devoted to mental freedom and progress;" is edited by John Grange and A. B Wakefield, and sells for two cents. The initial number has good articles by the editors, Toleman-Garner, Stanley Jones, Alvan Blake, Hypatia Bradlaugh Bonner, J. Greeves Fisher, Henry Smith, and others. Altogether the London Truth Seeker is a decidedly creditable exponent of Freethought principles. Long life and great success to it! ∴∴ W. T. Stead, lecturing in Sunderland, said that the devil was in the Board of Guardians of that town, and now Rev. W. A. McGonigle, chairman of said Board, retorts that Mr. Stead is "a speculativ mountebank" whose speech is "punctuated with profanity and underlined with cant." What brotherly love! ∴∴ Another Board of Guardians, that of Billericay, was petitioned to hav its proceedings opened with prayer, and the clergyman who seconded the motion said that such a prophylactic would be a good thing in "these days of Agnosticism." When it came to a ballot two voted for prayers and thirteen against, while four did not answer. That is a very pleasing "straw." ∴∴ The London Freethinker is positivly irreverent in its remarks about our great and only Talmage. We hope the Tabernacle orator does not read Brother Foote's paper, for, being of a modest disposition and very sensitiv, the good man's feelings might be hurt should his eye light on some things that hav lately appeared in that journal. ∴∴ Charles Watts will stand for East Lambeth at the London School Board elections. ∴∴ "The Executiv Committee of the Metropolitan Board teachers hav appealed to the entire body of teachers to sign a withdrawal form addressed to to the Board, praying for relief from the duty of dogmatic teaching," says the Freethinker. ∴∴ Father Robert Francis Clarke, writing in a Catholic church paper, givs it as his opinion that the Pentateuch was given to the later copyists by some one other than Moses.

My Seventieth Birthday.

This day, March 25, 1894, is my seventieth birthday. I hav now lived my three score and ten years and am entitled to a credit-mark. All those who liv to celebrate their seventieth birthday are entitled to credit, for they must hav been temperate, prudent, and careful, or they could not hav lived so long. The average length of human life is less than half of seventy years. Many people shorten or terminate their lives by intemperance, exposure, and recklessness—ignorance of the laws of health and life. This language may seem harsh to those who break down on the journey of life, but after a full investigation it will prove to be true.

I hav an object in writing this communication, as the reader will see as he follows me along. The seventieth birthday is a very notable milestone on the journey of life, and it is certainly very near the end of the journey. I wish to do something to celebrate my seventieth birthday that will help me to remember it. I hav thought the matter over and concluded to make a donation to the cause. I will donate $200 and divide it equally among the following-named Liberal papers and Freethought lecturers, who are known to me personally or by their works—$10 to each. There are others who are equally deserving, but my acquaintance is limited and my means still more so. The following are those I wish to remember: Boston Investigator, THE TRUTH SEEKER, Ironclad Age, Secular Thought. Freethinkers' Magazine, Independent Pulpit, B. F. Underwood, Wm. F. Jamieson, W. S. Bell, John E. Remsburg, Samuel P. Putnam. John Charlesworth, Franklin Steiner, Dr. J. L. York, Watson Heston, Mrs. M. A. Freeman, Voltarine de Cleyre, Elmina D. Slenker, Susan H. Wixon, Sara A. Underwood.

The money is now in the bank and ready for those entitled to receive it. Liberal papers will please copy enough of this letter to bring this donation to the knowledge of those journals and persons it is intended to benefit. Each of them is requested to send me a postal card or letter informing me how and where to send it. I will send by a draft on Chicago if no other way is indicated.

Years ago I helped toward supporting the churches, but their business has proved to be a humbug and a swindle. If $1 of my money would support a regiment of missionaries for a year I would not giv it. Carrying the gospel to the "heathen" makes a worse heathen of him than he was before. If I was a millionaire I would devote nine-tenths of my means to help Liberalism and destroy superstition. If a man has $100,000 he is as well off as money can make him. If millionaires could see things in that light they would put their money where it would benefit the world and not damage themselvs. But we are not all alike and cannot all see alike.

JOSEPH HAIGH.

[We heartily thank Mr. Haigh for the $10, which we hav received and used in the circulation of our church taxation pamphlet.—ED. T. S.]

"FARMS OR BOMBS" was the suggestiv title of the lecture delivered before the Manhattan Liberal Club, June 1st, by William Hemstreet. It was a plea for the return to and promotion of agricultural life, and the lecturer thought that by so doing many who are now driven to endure hardships in procuring the necessities of life amid the bustle and humdrum of city life and commercial competition would never lack for food and would be comfortable and happy. He also thought that there would not be so many cases of suicide if an agricultural regime was instituted. The discussion was interesting but the speakers were all city farmers.

Communications.

The Bottom Dog.

Sometimes I get so filled with holy indignation that I hav to stand up and testify before the Lord. When I see a man turn summersaults, flop over, dodge here and there, and change color like a chameleon, so that one is led to exclaim, "Now you see it and now you don't see it," I feel like pinning him down and holding him in position, so that the people can study and understand him. Mr. R. G. Horr, the handy man of the New York Tribune, is just such a man as I hav described.

Mr. John A. Sheffield, of Defiance, Ohio, asks Mr. Horr some questions in regard to money in the weekly Tribune of March 21, 1894, and in his answer he whips the devil around the stump so adroitly as to lead nine-tenths of the people to believe that there is no devil in the play. He seems half conscious that his statements do not hold together, for he says:

> They pick out a sentence in one article bereft of its connections, and then a sentence in some other article isolated from its context, which to them seems not to harmonize with the first sentence, and then they parade the two as being inconsistent with each other.

Let me tell Mr. Horr that truth always runs in parallel lines. From the dawn of the beginning (if any one knows when that was), no two truths ever contradicted each other. Two falsehoods may contradict each other, or a truth may contradict a falsehood, but all truth is in harmony. The reason why his sentences do not "harmonize" is because one at least contains a falsehood or an error. He says: "I am quite sure that he [Mr. Sheffield] is past all help"—that is, cannot be convinced; and I do not think that any man would be convinced who scans his statements closely. Mr. Sheffield asks a straightforward question, viz.: Can governments create money? How does he answer this question? He says: "Stated in another form." Is this question so abstruse or complex that Mr. Horr nor anybody else can understand it? There would be no need of stating the question in "another form" if he did not wish to deceive the people. No man knows better than Mr. Horr that governments can create money, but he does not want the people to know it. Instead of answering this simple question, he goes on to say:

> Governments hav the power to issue representativs of substances, but not the power to create the substances themselvs.

Nine out of ten will see this just as clear as mud, and believe that governments cannot create money, because they cannot create substances. Does any one think that Mr. Horr believes that money and "substances" are synonymous terms? yet he treats them as such. He seems to go upon the supposition that he has got the people so far hypnotized that they will accept wind for logic. He says further:

> If a man should ask me, "Is it possible for governments to issue bills of credit, promises to pay money?" and then whether it is possible to make such promises a legal tender for debts, and in that way to cause such promises to circulate as money, I should answer, "Yes; our government is doing that every day, and has been doing it for years, but every such piece of paper is a promis to pay something, and is not the thing itself."

Evidently the object of Mr. Horr is to lead the minds of the people away from the difference between real money and a promissory note. No matter whether a government promises to pay or an individual promises to pay, it is a note all the same.

Now, Mr. Horr, let us try your philosophy. When the government takes a piece of gold and stamps it "one dollar," is that money? When the government stamps a piece of silver "one dollar," is that money? And if the government should take a piece of paper and stamp it "one dollar," would not that be money just as much? If not, will Mr. Horr tell why? This talk about "creating substances" and "promises to pay" is all moonshine, calculated to put the people on a blind scent. Again he says:

> Gold, silver, and copper were created by God Almighty. They were mined and smelted by human beings. They were coined by the government. In coining them the government simply changed the shape and form of the metal; it created nothing.

Yes it did, it created money. Suppose the government should take an irregular-shaped piece of gold and change it to a cube, and then to a globe, and "change its shape and form" a hundred times, would it then be money? Mr. Horr knows better than that, if Mr. Roscoe doesn't. No matter what shape a piece of gold might be in, nor whether much or little, if by act of Congress that piece of gold was stamped "one dollar," it would be one dollar wherever the government has jurisdiction. Once more:

> The substances from which all real money is made were created by the Almighty, and brought into use by the human race, and cannot be created by legislation.

How adroitly he keeps "substance" before the mind, instead of money, as though that were the subject he is discussing. He reminds me of the darkey who was arrested for stealing a duck. He protested his innocence so strongly that he was discharged, when he exclaimed: "Golly, boss, dat was a tight squeak; ef you'd said 'drake' you'd had dis darkey suah."

If I should offer Mr. Horr a chunk of gold as big as his fist, and owed him a dollar, would he be obliged to take it and cancel the debt? Not at all. Why? Because I offer him a "substance" and not "money." But let the government take a small portion of that gold and put its stamp of "one dollar" upon it and then Mr. Horr would be compelled to take it or lose his debt. How has the wonderful change been wrought in that piece of gold? Why, it went into the hands of the government a "substance" and left the hands of the government "money." Money was created, or brought into existence, and it did not exist before.

Up to 1873 silver dollars were money. At that time silver dollars were demonetized and they were not money at all. This ought to satisfy Mr. Horr and everybody else that money is a creature of law and that God Almighty has nothing to do with it. Nations, at different times, when compelled by stress of circumstances to increase their volume of money, hav remelted their coins and reduced them in size, or effected the same end by alloy. This ought to satisfy Mr. Horr that governments can create "value," for they made a small coin worth as much as a large one. One nation uses silver for money exclusivly, another uses gold. We hav used gold, silver, paper, copper, nickel for money. Nations are no more compelled to use the same kind of material out of which to make money than they are to use the same kind of food. Whatever a sovereign power declares to be money, is money. It may be gold, silver, copper, nickel, brass, iron, wood, bark, leather, paper, shells, beads, cattle, pelts, or whatever other material it deems most proper and convenient. All of these materials and many more, first or last, hav been used as money; and I defy Mr. Horr to show that any people ever lost anything except in inconvenience by using these "substances" for money.

If silver had never been used as money, the silver in a dime would not be worth two cents. Mr. Horr says that governments cannot "create value." Did not the government reduce the silver in a dime to money, and by thus making money out of silver did it not "create" the difference in value in the silver in a dime from two to ten cents? It is one of the functions of government to create money. If governments cannot create money, where does it come from? Mr. Horr would hav his readers believe that to create money there must be a partnership between governments and God Almighty, and that neither can create it alone. Did Mr. Horr ever see any money in a gold or silver mine? Did he ever see God Almighty create any money? According to his theory God Almighty must be running a mint somewhere. If Mr. Horr will go down to Philadelphia he will see any amount of this "substance" that God Almighty created—but is it money? When this "substance" is dropped from the mint in dollars and eagles by act of Congress it is money—not before. Does God Almighty run the mint, or is it run by the government? The government can create money with a printing-press as well as a mint. Mr. Horr says:

> Government issued the greenbacks, but they hav always been promises to pay coin, not coin itself.

But suppose that instead of issuing promises to pay dollars the government should issue real paper dollars, which would pay debts, taxes, salaries, customs dues, and interest on the public debt, and the public debt itself, and buy whatever he wants, would not Mr. Horr be puzzled to find a reason why they would not be just as good as gold or silver dollars? I can giv a great many reasons why they would be much better. I am taking a great deal of liberty with Mr. Horr. Cowards are always bravest when there is no danger. Mr. Horr says he never replies to Populists. Mr. Horr may object to my paper-money scheme on the ground that it would hav no value, but he must remember that most of the gold that is mined is used for money. If it were not so used it would not be worth a dollar a pound. It is its use as money which givs gold the greater part of its value. Would not the use of paper money giv it a similar value, and for the same reason?

If the government can create money out of gold and silver, can it not create it out of copper, nickel, brass, bronze, zinc, aluminum, or any other metals, or their combinations—if God Almighty did not object? And if the government has this wide range in regard to "substances" out of which money can be made, what reason can Mr. Horr giv why it cannot be created out of paper? He seems to think that in some mysterious way God Almighty must be mixed in with the creation of money. I guess the idea comes from creating worlds out of nothing. Though the legend "In God We Trust" is on the coins, yet if we had to trust in God to create our money I am inclined to think we would hav an eternal shortage.

The great need of the country is more money, and we should hav it, and in sufficient amount to do the business of the country on a cash basis, if capital did not control the legislature and bribe the press. I get the weekly Tribune for less than a half cent a number—not enough to pay for the blank paper. The balance must come from interested parties. A man intimated to Mr. Vanderbilt that it was his duty to cultivate his brain as well as to fill his pockets. He replied, "Brains be damned. I can buy the best brains in America." That is a very discouraging as well as humiliating fact. Money sways the press, the press advocates the cause of the money lord, and the money lord in too many instances is put in position to vote money into his own pocket. John Swinton said that the editors of all the great papers were "intellectual prostitutes."

All of this misleading talk about "intrinsic value" and paper money being redeemed is little better than mental prostitution. Paper money is valuable just as a horse is valuable. A horse is valuable on account of the services he renders. And when the government takes a piece of paper and manipulates it so that it will buy anything we want, pay our debts and taxes, it becomes valuable on account of the many uses to which it can be put. In a nearby village a shoemaker took a piece of tin about the size of a dime and told a grocer that he wanted ten cents' worth of tobacco. The grocer put up the tobacco and raked the tin into the drawer. A shout went up from the bystanders, and they exclaimed: "Look at your ten-cent piece." The grocer carelessly replied: "I guess the ten-cent piece is all right." In a short time the grocer went to the next store and bought some article and tendered the tin dime. The merchant, to carry on the joke, accepted it and paid it out to some one else, and it passed from hand to hand, all regarding it as a huge joke. But the tin dime kept right on doing business. Finally, a man came into the shoe-shop to hav a patch put onto his shoe and the shoemaker charged him ten cents, and the man handed him back his tin dime and he took it. That tin dime did dollars and dollars worth of business. Did anyone lose anything—did anybody get cheated? That tin dime was just as valuable to effect those exchanges as a silver dime. Every time it changed hands value was received, and when it came back to the shoemaker it was certainly redeemed. So if a man should render service to the government, as the soldiers did, and take his pay in paper money, would not the government receive full value? And when this money was started on its mission, effecting exchanges and passing from hand to hand, would not everyone who received and paid it out giv and get value received? And when it paid taxes or was received by the government for customs dues, would it not be redeemed to all intents and purposes? What more can gold or silver money do? The government can create just such money, and Mr. Horr knows it; but he is paid to keep the fact away from the people.

But Mr. Horr will try to make the people believe that we would be compelled to break trade with our foreign neighbors because they would not take our money. If they want gold, can we not giv it to them? Will not our mines produce it? If not, ought we to wear it out and lose it doing business at home? Paper money, in proper volume, would circulate among the people and do the business of the country and distribute the wealth more equally. It could not be cornered, and it would not be necessary to keep millions of dollars in gold and silver lying idle at great expense to the people, and no more benefit to them than so many tons of cobblestone. France, England, and Germany hav seen times when they were compelled to hav more money than they could command. We passed through such a period during the last war, and may hav to pass through another. And then bonds must be issued and a stream of money to pay interest kept flowing from the wealth producers into the coffers of the bondholders for years.

With taxes to pay on hundreds of millions of church property, and a hundred thousand priests and ministers to support in useless idleness, it would seem as though we ought to consider that there must be a limit to the burdens that the people can bear up under. There are some things which the handy man of the Tribune does not want the people to know—viz., 1st. That the government has power to create money. 2d. That paper money will effect our exchanges just as well as gold, and will not cost the people half as much. 3d. That it is the only kind of money that can be so regulated as to volume as to bear a just proportion to the number of inhabitants and the amount of business done. 4th. With this kind of money it would be impossible for bankers and Shylocks to bring on a panic every decade, and swoop down like birds of prey upon the wealth producers, and fill their already plethoric pockets with ill-gotten gain, and turn out thousands of men to be imprisoned as tramps, or put to pounding stones as vagrants. 5th. With this kind of money the people could not be made to pay five per cent interest on the bonds upon which the banks are based, and thus allow the banks to draw a stream of money from the people at the back door in interest on the bonds and then make them pay six to twelve per cent at the bank counter to get money to use. 6th. That when money is plenty prices range high, and the producer can make his own money, and is not compelled to use that of old Shylock at ruinous rates.

In 1865, when money was plenty, McCulloch said: "Every man who wants a day's work can get it and good wages, and the people are prosperous and happy." Compare those times with the present. There were no tramps then to wander through the country and starve in the midst of plenty. But the handy man of the Tribune sweats and chafes and lolls and lathers to make the people believe those were just such times as the people do not want to-day. Whoop it up to 'em, Mr. Horr! Rip 'em up the back; who cares a damn how much the people suffer if a few can roll in wealth, and we can get down to a "single gold standard" and hav an "honest dollar" and a "sound currency?" Mr. Horr is after his pound of flesh and doesn't care a cuss how much blood he draws. I do not blame Mr. Roscoe, for he doesn't know any better. He has not yet learned the difference between money and a promissory note.

The key to all this infernal racket about an honest dollar and a sound currency and a single gold standard is found in the advice of a British capitalist and aristocrat given to the rich men and bloodsuckers of this country. The plan is to control wages, which he says can be done by controling the money, the object being to reduce the laboring class in this country to the level of European labor.

Like everything else, when money is scarce, it is hard to get. It takes more labor, more produce, to get a certain amount. When money is scarce it can be cornered and controled by the rich. When money is scarce it is hard to pay debts. The poor owe the rich; and when debts are contracted when money is plenty and prices are high, and hav to be paid when money is scarce and prices low, it takes more labor or produce to pay them. This difference redounds to the benefit of the creditor class. It will be found that most farms and homes which hav been and are to be sold under foreclosure were mortgaged when money was plenty and prices were high. These homes and farms would not hav been sold if the volume of money and the prices had been kept uniform. These farms will go into the hands of men whose condition is above that of the mortgager. Hence the tendency is toward the accumulation of vast tracts of lands in the hands of the few, and the money follows the land as it did in the decline of Rome.

Rich men—those drawing salaries, bondholders, bankers, annuitants, and all men having fixed incomes—will favor scarce money, and advocate what is called a "sound currency," and "gold standard," and "honest money," and inveigh against "inflation," "rag money," and "dishonest dollars." Hence it is plain to see why the handy man of the Tribune brings his artillery to bear on the Democratic party in regard to the tariff, but is in perfect accord with it in regard to money. This may seem a little mysterious to the uninitiated, but it is explained in a secret circular sent out by Wall street to the bankers and Shylocks not long ago. It says:

> The people must be kept in a condition of antagonism. The question of tariff reform must be urged through the organization of the Democratic party. And the question of protection with reciprocity must be forced to public view through the Republican party. By thus dividing the voters, we can get them to expend their energies in fighting each other over questions of no importance to us.

Now, can you see why Carlisle goes to Wall street when he wants to take counsel in regard to banks, bonds, or money? Can you see why Grover Cleveland and John Sherman greet each other with a holy kiss, and join in a fraternal embrace when there is any legislation touching the money question? The truth is, the Democratic party and the Republican party are only different wings of the same army under the command of King Shylock. The government has drifted into or is controled by the many lords of the country, and legislation is in their interests. Our primaries and nominating conventions are run by unscrupulous ringsters and bosses, who are willing to unite church and state, or let the "Union slide," if they can only mount the crest of the popular wave and get away with the swag. The old Jeffersonian ideas of government are lost sight of, and the platforms of the old parties was formulated by Mr. Vanderbilt, and can be expressed in few words, "The people be damned." I bring this indictment against the old parties not out of any ill-will, but because I am interested in the public welfare, and would feel that I was not discharging my duty to say less.

Advancing age admonishes me that I shall not write many more articles, and I am loth to hav my friends think that I would write anything which I do not consider for the public good. Mark this prediction: Unless the laboring classes marshal their forces, and oppose with manly fortitude the encroachments of capital, the child is now born who will liv to see the laborer of this country outlawed.

Observations.

There is nothing to rejoice over in the fact that the Prophet of Gowanus has written the closing paper in the discussion which he evoked with the undersigned some months ago; and, so far as I am concerned, there is little to regret. Still, I wish that he had quit in a better temper, though perhaps that is scarcely to be expected of one who has played his full number of innings without scoring a point. It will be noticed that the statement of what Mr. Roscoe terms his "main proposition" has been reserved for his last letter instead of being introduced earlier in the discussion—a proceeding that speaks highly for the author's sagacity, since the said "main proposition" is thereby saved from negativ criticism. If he had said before that the free coinage of silver would double the money cost of articles which we find it necessary to buy, I should hav hinted that, as this would involve the obtaining of two prices for that which we hav to sell, the hardship would not be unbearable. I do not, however, indorse the proposition as wholly sound. I regard it as a prophecy, merely, and it is never safe to deal with prophecies until after the date of their maturity.

Mr. Roscoe is not quite satisfied with the present aspect of the dispute about the cause of the currency of cent-pieces. The government manufactures these coins and makes twenty-five of them legal tender for a quarter of a dollar. Now, in New York, one can readily dispose of fifty or one hundred of these coins in payment of a bill to the amount of a half dollar or a dollar, while in San Francisco, where they possess the same legal quality, he could not exchange them for car fare, for damaged fruit, or even for a tamale. Which of these facts government monopoly and coinage are responsible for, I hav not undertaken to say, merely suggesting that the New Yorker receives cent-pieces because he can pass them again, while the San Franciscan refuses them because he cannot.

Over the difference between "redeemed" and "exchanged," Mr. Roscoe may turn all the verbal somersets he wants to. The practical odds, in the way I hav used the former word, are not great. Mr. Roscoe holds that the paying out of a government note, or any other note, for any desired commodity is "exchange." Let him hav it so; the result is precisely the same as though the buyer had previously turned the note into gold at the subtreasury and effected his purchase afterward. The person who cannot see this is the one whose mind is mystified with words instead of clarified by the contemplation of facts.

"It is certain," says Mr. Roscoe, basing the statement upon an argument of his own, "that the rise in the purchasing power of gold is due almost entirely to the decrease in the cost of producing those things for which gold is exchanged." How about real estate? Has the introduction of labor-saving machinery caused an over-supply of land and a consequent lessening of the expense of producing it? If the volume of gold is not decreasing proportionately to the population, it seems to me that even wages should be stable, since there has been no appreciable decrease in the cost of producing laborers. But the fact is, that land, though necessarily in greater demand than ever, and labor, though its capacity has been enormously augmented, are both cheaper than they hav been. Add to this the further facts that the per capita money wealth of the country is falling off, and that the per capita circulation, owing to the hoarding of gold, is away down, and the necessity of a financial change would seem sufficiently apparent to justify somebody in suggesting such a measure.

I am informed that owing to my unfamiliarity with the question under discussion I hav been unable to present the most cogent arguments in favor of the free coinage of silver. This, of course, is a great disappointment to Mr. Roscoe, who has probably invested in some volume warranted to expose all the fallacies of the leading silver men, and my neglect to reproduce those fallacies has made it impossible for him to administer the prescribed dose. He has my sympathy. But admitting my own insufficiency, I would like to inquire whether the cause of the monometallists relies entirely upon the supports presented by Mr. Roscoe. Is the evidence all in, and do they rest with his concluding effort? Is that their case?

Professor Cook, of Kansas, has written a poem entitled, "A Tribute to S. P. Putnam," of which the following is the opening part:

> Brave Putnam, in the mental field,
> To freedom's foes will never yield,
> But presses on the light to spread,
> By science, truth, and Freethought led.
> One hundred nineteen years ago
> His namesake faced the British foe;
> Yes, when he heard of Lexington,
> Unyoked his team and snatched his gun.
> With inspiration, courage, will,
> He led the brave at Bunker Hill;
> His bosom glowed with Freedom's flame—
> Immortal Putnam, glorious name!

A good deal of poetry comes to this office, but the Editor has not a very keen appreciation of anything inferior to Shakspere or Tennyson, so that much of it is not printed. My own has to be sworn in after the style of a challenged vote, and unless I can use that of a contributor to point a moral or adorn a tale it don't go. The mute, inglorious Miltons are my pie, and I shall giv more of Mr. Cook's poem hereafter.

The editor hands me the following communication, which he has received:

LOCUST CORNER, O., May 27, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: With your kind permission I would offer a suggestion.

Though my name is not on your subscription list, I receive THE TRUTH SEEKER regularly and should be sorry to find this powerful organ of Freethought losing its popularity, in a measure, from a cause which may be unsuspected by the Editor. I refer to the weekly page of "Observations."

Mr. George Macdonald being a brother to the Editor would naturally seem to be very close to the Editor himself, and that his writings are practically editorials. I am not alone in this view, nor in the opinion that matters purely political should, for policy's sake, be avoided by the editors.

A free and open discussion of tariff and money questions between correspondents might be well, but those Freethinkers who believe that the prosperity of our country demands a protectiv tariff will hardly relish being called robbers and pirates by a brother of the Editor, and the suffering thousands, many of whom believe their misery to be caused by uncertainty due to the present peril of the protectiv tariff, will not be grateful to Mr. George Macdonald for trying to inaugurate the principle of destruction of their industries and the starvation of their wives and little ones.

Of course the more fortunate student of American politics, after reading one of the "Observations" in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 19th, to wit: "It cannot, of course, be maintained that the employee is benefited by the protectiv tariff, because there is free trade in labor," can afford to be very charitable with Mr. George, seeing, as he will at a glance, that the usually bright brain of G. E. Macdonald, can accommodate a very large increase of political knowledge without hurtful crowding.

Three of my acquaintances, all thorough Freethinkers, declare that they cannot conscientiously support a journal whose Editor advocates the destruction of American industries and the impoverishment of American wage-earners. One has already ceased and the others will not renew. I can but regret this, because I most heartily wish for the success of THE TRUTH SEEKER and would be sorry to hav it share the fate of Freethought.

Yours for success, CHAS. O. HAYS.

The above correspondent errs in viewing this column as in a sense editorial. That is a fundamental error. If the Editor desired that these observations should express his thought he would write them himself. He does not hold himself to answer for anything of mine, nor I for anything of his, and we are not agreed as to which escapes the greater responsibility. As a rule my contributions do not affect the paper's circulation or finances unfavorably.

I am obliged to notice that as yet nobody who agrees with the so-called "political" notions discussed here occasionally has ever complained of the introduction of politics. The introduction is offensiv only when the ideas advanced are not assented to. If I had characterized the protectiv tariff as a national blessing, does anybody suppose that Mr. Hays would hav objected to Observations or raised a warning voice? He might not hav been worked up to the point of subscribing for a paper in whose prosperity he is so deeply interested, but he would certainly hav assured the Editor of his distinguished regard.

The Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER is a person of great intellectual hospitality, and I hav noticed that the opinions of his subscribers are always given due weight and courteous consideration; but I hav not observed that the kicking of a correspondent whose communication opens with the words, "Though my name is not on your subscription list," and who intimates that he is about to discontinue borrowing the paper, influences his conduct as business manager. The trinity of "three acquaintances" introduced by Mr. Hays is a somewhat antiquated myth.

As to the tariff, I still regard it as an act of confiscation. The sort of protection the people just now stand in need of is protection from their protectors, and they will continue to need it so long as the tariff iniquity is permitted to exist. No political party, so far as I know, has taken this view of the matter; it is not, therefore, a political question, but one of right, honesty, and common sense, which can scarcely be called political factors.

The church has a new enemy in the automatic gum machine. Small children, on their way to worship, hav got in the habit of slipping their missionary pennies into the machine and extracting therefrom chewing gum, instead of making the designed contribution to the conversion of the heathen. In consequence, Sunday-school collections are falling off, and various clergymen hav inaugurated a crusade against this fresh device of Satan. As the heathen hav not been heard from, and as the children appear to enjoy the gum, it looks as though the church would hav to absorb the machine to save the pennies. A nice nickel-in-the-slot device, duly consecrated, would not be a bad substitute for that old offender, the contribution box, and if there were gum in it the contributor would at least hav something to show for his money.

A committee is investigating the New York police department, and there is also some inquiry into the proceedings of the United States Senate touching the question of the bribery of members. In the case of the police, it is noticeable that the derelictions charged are all with relation to the morals of the community, a thing with which the police rightfully hav no concern; while in the Senate the trouble has arisen over the sugar schedule in the tariff bill, a matter which has no business in the legislature. When citizens learn to look after their own morals and commerce, instead of hiring officials for that purpose, such corruption in office will become impracticable. But while the city itself shares the profits of immorality, and the country looks to spoliation for its revenues, public servants will not cease to learn the lesson so plainly taught by their employers.

Speaking of bribery, a rare case of official rectitude was exhibited a few years ago by a member of the first legislature of the state of Washington. It was openly charged that the election of Senator Squire was procured by the purchase of representativs, and those who professed to know all about it claimed that $3 000 was the current price of votes. A representativ from one county came home poor, and was therefore pointed to as a living example of incorruptibility. Even his colleague swore that he never got a cent. "No," said the colleague, "when the wire-pullers offered John $3,000 for his vote, he was immovable as a rock. Five thousand was the least he would take."

In commending military training in schools, particularly parochial schools, the same being provided at public expense, the New York Sun says:

> Religion and patriotism are inculcated in the boys as kindred virtues, and they are receiving a physical training which will cultivate in them self-respect and the power of endurance under the strain of life. The whole movement is wise and of the highest social use.

There is a sort of writing that Colonel Burr of Washington calls "flapdoodle," under which head the foregoing can be very appropriately placed. When patriotism is inculcated along with religion it is pretty likely to be as much of a humbug as its contemporary. Piety is the favorit cloak for hypocrisy; and the present enthusiasm of the church for "American institutions" goes a good way toward proving the truth of the remark that patriotism is the last resort of scoundrels. The physical benefits of the drill are insignificant. Every position of the soldier is unnatural, and is dropped when the command "at ease" is given. The boys are merely turned into pieces of mechanism. As a consequence, when out of uniform and out of the ranks they are inclined to go to the other extreme and to become noticeably slouchy in their bodily positions and movements. In the ranks there is a machine-like obedience; among the officers a pomposity and affected strut. On the one hand enforced submission to brutality and insult; on the other the overbearing manners that would not be tolerated except in a uniform. The boys who are trained under the present system, inaugurated by Harrison, will either leave school to forget all their knowledge of military tactics, or to be absorbed into the militia, resulting in a standing army as a new burden for the country. In the first case their drilling will hav proved useless; in the second, a good deal worse. If the school curriculum is to be enlarged, it should include manual instead of military training. In times of peace, the saw and hammer are vastly superior in point of usefulness to the sword and gun; while an hour in the gymnasium of a Turn Verein is, for purposes of bodily culture, better than a week in the ranks. I do not think that the present revival of soldiering indicates any increase in the warlike spirit; but the gun-manufacturers, the military tailors, and retired patriots out of a job need business in accoutering, clothing, and drilling the toy soldiers, while religion and "patriotism" are seriously in want of the stimulant which this sort of tomfoolery provides.

GEO. E. MACDONALD.

News and Notes.

The campaign this week has been one of varied interest and pleasure. The Freethought pioneer work has many bright places. Northport, Long Island, is one of these. The churches are pretty well established here; but there is no lack of Liberal ideas. I gave five lectures, and the audiences, although not large, increased from evening to evening. I endeavored as much as possible to hav the subject-matter discussed; but very few seemed disposed to come forward. The churches hav come to the conclusion to keep silence. In fact, the only one to lend a hand for the Christian religion was a Jew; and whether he is a converted Jew or not, I do not know, for his assertions were very vague, with a pretense of much knowledge. His arguments were like those of the Rev. Mr. Hastings, who flourishes all around the subject but never meets the real issue. It is very seldom that a Jew will side in with a Christian; but once in a while one will do it, but not to the honor of the ancient religion. My opponent seemed to be somewhat behind the times on scientific questions, though I believe it is rumored that he does understand the Hebrew language. He labored under the impression that evolution was still a theory and not a demonstration, and that was the point he endeavored to make, which might hav done very well for a half century ago, but will not do for to-day, any more than if one should assert that the steam-engin was a theory and not a fact. I tried to answer his indefinit vagaries with proper courtesy; but I much fear that he was carried away by his own conceit, and did not even hav the clear sightedness of Balaam's ass. He couldn't see a point any more than the recalcitrant prophet. He is evidently of the ancient order of the Jewish race. The intelligent portion of these people to-day stand neither by Moses nor Jesus, but by science and modern thought, and hav no desire to prolong the superstitions of the past.

Northport in this lovely month of June is in the crown of its glory. The trees and grass are shining in emerald luster, and the waters are like a diamond beneath the clear sky. This is about the handsomest port on Long Island; and the wooded hills about make a charming prospect as one looks from the glittering sea beyond the sandy beaches. I spent three days on the water, and enjoyed the luxury of forgetting on the dreamy deep the struggle of existence. Exhilarating is the motion and music of the far-sweeping tide. The first day I was on board the steamer "Mystery," with Capt. Seymour and N. L. Pidgeon. This was the boat which bore the pilgrims to Ingersoll's lecture at Norwalk, and on its return voyage in the thick mist stranded on Eaton's point, but without injury to boat or passengers. But as usual the orthodox tried to find a good deal of divine and frowning providence in this slight delay, and heralded all over the country that the Infidel party was wrecked. But "God," it seems, was unacquainted with Long Island Sound, and did not know the best place for wrecking purposes. The "Mystery" is as sound as ever, and I floated in her with perfect safety over the shining expanses. The next two days I spent with Capt. Scott in his beautiful naphtha boat, which glides like a bird over the waters. I went to Oyster Bay and over to Norwalk, Conn., and met A. B. Bennett and other Liberal friends. Capt. Cole, our stanch supporter, I am sorry to say, was on the sick list the first days of the campaign, but was with us the last voyage; and this trip was indeed a delightful one. Long in memory will linger the splendor of the sea—the varying sky with white and golden clouds—the calm and welcoming harbor—the beaches—the green banks and soft declivities. Amidst such scenes one can dream that this world is growing brighter. Again I enjoyed the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. Dexter K. Cole; and I am sure that with the aid of generous friends something has been done for progress.

It was my privilege to pass a delightful Sunday with Ingersoll and his family on the banks of the wonderful Hudson, where certainly one can get as near to heaven as is possible on this planet. The house, which has the appearance of a beautiful castle, is situated five hundred feet above the banks, and from this hight the noble river is seen stretching away for many miles, with the grand hills on the opposit shore and deep woods near by, green lawns, gardens, orchards, and winding walks. The delicious country life is round about, the roar of the city being lost in the quiet, disturbed only by the continuous music of nature's choir of birds and insects. The cows and the chickens and the horses complete the rural picture, with the spring flowing underneath the spreading branches of the ancient forest, and mingling with all the smiles and grace of little children. Well, it was one of those days that make the poetry of human life, more than a thousand bibles or a thousand churches; that fills the heart with hope, and givs courage to plunge again into the dust and turmoil of life's battle.

After writing my "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," roaming through the radiant portions of human history, I must now take to the campaign work again in distant fields. In another column is outlined my work until September. After that I desire to take my course through Washington, Oregon, California, Arizona, and Texas, and I hope that friends will do their best to arrange for lectures. We must push the work. Unless we educate the people how can we deal successfully with the politicians, who will follow the people perhaps, but who will never lead them?

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Suffrage for Women.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 27th ult. a letter over the signature of C. C Fisk touches a matter of great importance. He unequivocally declares that woman suffrage ought to be added to the Nine Demands of Liberalism Mr. Fisk has expressed the thought that has been and is in the minds of all true, right-minded men and women, of all who believe in justice and equity.

The reasons why women should exercise the right and privilege of the ballot are plain enough and need no setting forth before the intelligent readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. And upon this question, as in eveything else pertaining to human development, emancipation, and progression, Liberals should lead and not follow. There should be no hesitation, no standing back, no awaiting results of the work of others, no bringing up the rear. Liberals should stand foremost in the vanguard.

In every great movement where women hav been benefited Liberals hav extended a helping hand, and every advantage women enjoy to-day has come, directly or indirectly, from Liberal-minded men. And should they hold back in a matter of such significance as is conveyed in the thought of making woman as free as is man? As an argument against the movement it is urged that women with the ballot in their hands would advance the interests of religion and superstition, but what women would or would not do is not to be considered in a question of right. It has never been asked whether a man would be in favor of superstitious fancies or not when he receives the ballot into his hands. He does as he pleases. It is not to be supposed that women would make worse errors of judgment than hav men, judging from that which we see and know.

The higher education of women has broadened the mind as nothing else has done. With more activ opportunities will come a deeper sense of responsibility, a stirring of the forces of reason and common sense. And it must always be borne in mind that women did not make the Bible, did not put the curse upon herself, did not make the creeds nor fashion the catechism. The whole frame-work and construction of superstition, with all the diabolical train of evils, hav been the work of men. When men became free from the tyrannies of the church they shifted the responsibility of maintaining that institution to the shoulders of women. But because this state of things obtains now is no reason for believing it will always be. The means and measures that liberated men from the thraldom of superstition, if applied to women, will free them also. There is no rule for one sex that does not apply to the other.

The signs of the times show plainly enough that the church is accurately measuring the value and prestige that will accrue to it by the approval of suffrage for women. Nor need anyone be surprised if the Catholic church in this matter appears in advance of Protestantism. Last fall at the municipal election in this city the Catholic priests made a house-to-house canvass, commanding Catholic women to register and vote for school committee, the only suffrage privilege women hav in Massachusetts, and the only reason they did not elect their candidates was that they did not begin to register soon enough. Protestant women became aroused and went to the polls in large numbers and elected their ticket. Nor are Catholic women all fools. Those who hav received the benefit of an education in our public schools, and who hav learned the meaning of the Australian ballot system, are not likely to be hoodwinked or browbeaten at election time. But that is neither here nor there. The question is, Will Liberal men heed the coming events that cast their shadows before? Will they show that they realize the meaning of freedom by frankly and emphatically showing to the world that they accept no right or privilege for themselvs that they do not cheerfully accord to every other without reference to sex or creed? The Cause in Oregon.

Leaving the Portland Secular Church in charge of Miss Olds, Mr. Smith, and the Portland friends, I went to Forest Grove, April 15th, to lecture and to report progress of Auxiliary No. 2 of the Oregon State Secular Union, which is in charge of Annie E. Barker. Mrs. Barker has lectured every Sunday evening for this Union and conducted its Secular Sunday school since the organization of the circuit last February. The Sunday school is the finest of its kind in the state, and, so far as I know, in the country. Its membership is about ninety-five, and it uses the paraphernalia sent out by the State Union—the same that is used in all the Secular Sunday schools of Oregon. Two groups of children from eight to fifteen years of age use the Lesson leaflets. The first had eleven members and was ably led by Mrs. Abbott, who is also assistant superintendent of the Sunday school. The second group had ten members and was conducted by one of the brightest little women in the state—Mrs. S. T. Crow. Her enthusiasm was reflected in the bright eyes and happy faces of all her pupils, and her kind words and gentle manners make a power in the school Mrs. Barker conducts the third group, which numbers at least twenty-five young men and women. She is an educator, a builder, a constructiv Secularist, and she has gathered in her group some of the brightest young people in Forest Grove. The fourth group is called the Progressiv Bible class. A Christian minister—Rev. Mr. Hazel, I think, is his name—has, by invitation, been the leader of this group for several Sundays. He entertained hopes of "converting" the members, but from present indications he will hav to stay away from the meetings or he will learn enough to make him a Secularist. The work outlined by the State Union for this advanced group consists of studying the Bible, Koran, and the sacred writings of different nations, and also discussions upon the leading topics of the day. "The History of Cremation" was to be their next theme. Mrs. Barker's Juvenil Choir is a band of boys and girls of which our Forest Grove friends can all be proud. The literary exercises, consisting of songs, recitations, and a dialog by two very bright boys, were exceptionally fine. The calisthenic drill was heartily enjoyed and participated in by nearly all the school. Seeing several young children, suggestions were given with regard to forming a kindergarten class, which will be under the charge of Mrs. C. W. Robinson.

Could the Liberals who are asking the question, "How can we make local unions flourish?" visit the society at Forest Grove or the parent organization at Portland they would hav their question satisfactorily answered. No matter how many suggestions are given to local unions, they will not thrive until a regular lecturer includes them in a circuit, organizes secular Sunday-schools, and makes it his or her business to make them flourish.

A fine audience assembled Sunday evening, when I lectured on "The Fiction of the Christian's Easter Day." At Mrs. Barker's request I also talked a few minutes on the American Protectiv Association and the Junior Order of United American Mechanics, taking the ground that both these organizations are dangerous to our liberty and that Secularists cannot afford to identify themselvs with them.

The most prominent worker in this auxiliary is the worthy treasurer of the Oregon State Secular Union, D. C. Stewart. Mr. and Mrs. Stewart are thorough Liberals, and it is indeed a pleasure to know them and their three bright children.

I left Forest Grove feeling more assured than ever that the Oregon State Secular Union is on the right track; that it is in a position to really accomplish permanent results; that its growth must come through patient, earnest, aggressiv work, and that it never can accomplish much permanent work by merely holding one mass meeting a year, leaving Christians to furnish amusement for Secularists and the rising generation the rest of the time.

I wish to say to the Secularists in the vicinity of Forest Grove that Mrs. Barker will respond to calls to lecture during the week whenever she can do so, and not conflict with her regular Sunday evening lecture. Nettie A. Olds, who is also one of the Oregon State Secular Union licensed lecturers, delivered an address before the Forest Grove Union on "Free Moral Agency," and so great was the enthusiasm that they all want her back again.

We hav still three thousand membership blanks on hand. Oregon Liberals, let us hear from you. If you want a lecturer, or desire a Secular Sunday school established, write, and a representativ of the Oregon State Secular Union will be with you and bring necessary instructions and materials. What Portland and other places are doing, you can do. Liberals living outside of this state must inclose postage for reply to their letters of inquiry. The Oregon State Secular Union treasury needs funds and cannot afford to send materials outside of the state, unless postage is paid. Since last report, there has been received twenty-five cents each from M. Spahn, D. C. Hatch, and Earnest Hatch, Portland.

KATIE KEHM SMITH,
Sec. Oregon State Secular Union.

The Puritans of Glasgow, Scotland, hav called on the city council to put a stop to the desecration of the Sabbath by forbidding the running of street cars on Sunday. The council hav declined to interfere and the Puritans are holding indignation meetings. The most immoral town on earth is this same Glasgow. Why don't the Puritans rescue the poor from their ignorance, and filth, and drunkenness, rather than attempt the ridiculous and impossible? —Kate Field's Washington.

It is said that the Czar was so affected by a very realistic painting of "The Crucifixion" at the St. Petersburg Salon that he ordered it to be removed as being too revolting. It is strange that he endures unmoved the practical crucifixion of an entire race, and does not regard as revolting their treatment by official knout-masters throughout the empire. But the Czar is not the only sovereign to whom thumbscrew and lash seemed part of the litany, and whose prostrations at worship were redoubled with every fresh victim ascending the place of torture.—San Francisco Public Opinion.

The following sums for the Freethought Federation of America hav been received at this office: B. B. Rockwood, $5; E. O. Tuttle, $1; Ernest Heck, $5.

June 29th—Last meeting of the season. Five minute speeches on "What One Thing Would You Hav the Constitutional Convention Do?" alternating with musical and elocutionary entertainment. Admission 10 cents, at the door.

DR. E. B. FOOTE, JR., lectured last Friday before the Liberal Club on "Vaccination or Sanitation." The address included a general history of vaccination. During the recent smallpox scare in Brooklyn Dr. Foote employed a man to visit the infected district for the purpose of obtaining such information as he could. By this means it was learned that deaths had resulted from unheard of visits at all hours of the day; that people were coerced into being vaccinated in the presence of policemen, and that even children suffering from measles and other diseases, and almost on their deathbeds, were forced to undergo the operation, thus hastening their death. All cases of death due to vaccination, the speaker said, were, so far as possible, kept from the public or attributed to other diseases; and the suffering caused by this method of warding off diseases could hardly be imagined. Dr. Foote is an anti-vaccinationist, and holds that disease is often contracted from the virus instead of being prevented by it Drs. Holbrook, McCallum, and Hitchcock were present and expressed their agreement with the lecturer's remarks.

KATIE KEHM SMITH, secretary of the Oregon Secular Union, writes: "The Secularists of McMinnville, Or., are jubilant. A course of Liberal lectures has so enthused them that, as soon as arrangements can be perfected, an auxiliary to the Oregon State Secular Union will be formed there. Saturday evening, April 28th, I lectured on 'The Fiction of the Christians' Easter Day;' the following Sunday afternoon on 'What Secularism Has Done for Woman,' and Sunday evening my subject was 'Freethought—The Fundamental Reform.' My last lecture was followed by an address by Mr. Smith on 'The Defense of the One-Talent Man.' The Sunday evening meeting especially was a grand success, no part of it being more enjoyed than the music by Prof. W. M. Toney and his splendid orchestra McMinnville is fortunate in having so fine an orchestra, and the Secularists there will not soon forget the kindness of its members. Professor Toney justly feels proud of his assistants. The orchestra is composed of A. Walling, cornet; Mrs. Eva Walling, piano; E. Branson, clarinet; A. Adams, 2d clarinet; M. Walker, trombone; C. Hodson, bass viol; and J. Walker, piccolo.

"While at McMinnville we enjoy the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. W. T. Booth, who with ready heart and hand are always working for the great cause of mental liberty. Mr. Booth is one of earth's noblemen. In his quiet, unassuming way, he sows the seeds of Freethought, and in his family circle happiness and love rule supreme. Miss Alta Booth, their bright seventeen-years-old daughter, can hold her own with any Christian, and she will one day be a fine worker in our cause. Another daughter, Mrs. Ford, is also a thorough Liberal, and a musician. Her voice is rich and clear, and she will make a fine leader for the Secular choir of the McMinnville auxiliary. Her husband, E. N. Ford, is one of the leading citizens of McMinnville, vice-president of its bank, and manager of a large implement store. Among others we met were Mr. and Mrs. D. A Wallace, Mr. and Mrs. Fuller, Mr. and Mrs. Clark, who are always on hand to work for the cause, Mary A. Booth, John Booth and family, Messrs. Bogue, Jolly, Gant, and so many more we can't remember all the names. Monday we spend at the house of Nettie A. Olds, with her father and mother, Dr. A. K. and M. J. Olds. Few Liberals in this country but know of the work and the generous aid which Mr. and Mrs. Olds hav given to further Secularism. How encouraging to know that their talented daughter is now doing such splendid work in the same cause. It gave us strength and hope to spend these few days among our earnest friends. As soon as a competent lecturer is ready to take charge another circuit and Secular church will be organized with its Secular Sunday-schools."

HARRISONVILLE, Mo , May 23, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: As the eleventh hour has struck I hasten to send the wherewithal for my renewal to the grandest of all Liberal papers and Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." I am anxious to hav my name enrolled with that grand army of thinkers. MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5, for "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." I hav asked several men that call themselvs Liberals to subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER. They could not do it, and when I went around with the petition to Congress to keep their God out of the Constitution, they could not do it. I do not know which they were afraid of—their little god or their fellow-man. I made out to get six names where I know there are sixty who call themselvs Infidels.

MR. EDITOR: I send you $6—$5 for "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," and $1 for S. P. Putnam, to help him fight the religious tyrants. I would get you some subscribers if I could. They left the place several years since I hav taken the paper since it started. I am now eighty-two years old and cannot expect to take it much longer. I shall want it as long as I can see to read it.

ABNER KIMBALL.

It Dissipates Theological Mist.

BERRYESSA, CAL., E. M 294.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will please find $5, which is to pay for the pleasure of reading THE TRUTH SEEKER, in the past, present, and a while into the future. We consider it one of the best of papers to advance the reader and dissipate the theological mist that has for so long shut out reason and truth. The letters from Mr. Putnam, Mr. Peck, and Mr. Charlesworth are just splendid, and to the women workers, Miss Gardener and Miss Wixon, too much praise cannot be given. It is my intention to hav "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," that our children may know who were the true founders of science, reason, education, and advancement. Wishing you every success,

Yours for truth and liberty,

MRS GEO. W. SMITH.

A Welcome Sunday Visitor.

HAWTHORN, IA., May 20, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find twenty-five cents for five copies of the Paine Memorial Number. I was much pleased to find my name in the Iowa list of subscribers to "Four Hundred Years of Freethought."

In reading THE TRUTH SEEKER I noticed some time ago that one of your many correspondents said that the paper was like old wine—it got better with age—which is true. I receive it on Saturday or Sunday generally, and a welcome Sunday visitor it is. The letters from our Freethought lecturers are alone worth more than the price of the paper, and when I renew I shall try to send for a premium book or renew for two years.

This letter contains a small remittance, but I trust it is not wholly void while on its way to the waste-basket.

To me, parting with the paper would be like parting with an old friend.

WALTER RUNNELS.

Did Not Leave the House This Time.

DANVILLE, ILL., May 23, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I send $8 for Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," THE TRUTH SEEKER, "Researches in Oriental History," and "History of the Bible."

Ingersoll came, saw, and was seen and heard. The opera house was full of people belonging to Danville and adjoining towns. Every good point seemed appreciated. His subject was "What Must We Do to Be Saved?" Although he sometimes struck out pretty hard, I did not see one person indignant enough to rise and leave the house, as was the case when he lectured here before, so perhaps we hav progressed some. A good synopsis of his lecture was given in the News next day, also of his political speech. And there the matter dropped. L. W. LOUTZENHISER.

Bears Unavoidable Loss Bravely.

CHELSEA, MICH., May 28, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 to pay for "Four Hundred Years of Freethought."

Should hav sent my subscription sooner but for the sad death of my dear wife and daughter, both withiu the past year, from that dread disease, consumption. They were both ardent Freethinkers like myself and both enjoyed unbounded faith that they would share all future happiness that may be in store for any of our race. Two sons and myself are left to cherish their memory and weep over their graves. We realize that, however trying these afflictions are, they come to all sooner or later, and are to be bravely endured.

Very truly yours, JAMES TAYLOR.

P.S.—I notice in THE TRUTH SEEKER, since writing the above, your offer to friends of THE TRUTH SEEKER of a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER one year and "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" for $6.50. Accordingly I inclose that amount instead of $5, for which send me the book and the paper one year.

A Demonstration.

NEW HAVEN, MICH., May 24, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: One fundamental principle of the Christian religion is that all things are and hav always been known to God. Another belief essential to Christianity is that God is love. These two dogmas are inculcated by believers of every denomination. But it can be proven by clear and conclusiv reasoning that they contradict each other.

We will undertake to demonstrate this by one event in Bible history, the deluge According to holy writ the entire human race except one family was destroyed by the flood. Man had become very wicked. God had repented him that he had made man, and sent this flood to destroy him from off the face of the earth. These people could not hav repented before death, for in that case their destruction would no longer hav been necessary. Dying in their sins, there was only one place, every Christian must admit, for their immortal souls to go to; that place was hell, where they will abide in horrible suffering through all eternity.

Being all-wise, God must hav known from the very beginning what an awful doom awaited these antediluvians should they be allowed to exist. Being omnipotent, he who brought the universe into existence by simply willing it, most certainlv was able to prevent the birth of any being, who, living, would be predestined for damnation.

As he did not do this, we are forced to only one conclusion: He deliberately decided to sentence to everlasting, uninterrupted agony the creatures whom his caprice should create in his own image. He had his choice whether this fearful thing should or should not be, and, with a fiendish cruelty of which the earth affords no example, he chose the former. And yet this monster is declared to be identical with love and is the one whom people, supposed to be civilized and intelligent, teach their children to worship.

A TRUTH SEEKER.

Cannot Understand a Donble or Triple Standard.

PETERSBURG, IND., May 28, 1894.

MR EDITOR: I can easily understand how a good Christian who honestly, though ignorantly, believes that 3=1 and that 1=3 and that one is three, etc., can believe in the financial fallacy of two or three equal and overruling standards or measures of value; but I do not think that this postal order for $3, which I inclose, although it will pay my subscription to your paper until sometime in next December, and represents the coin I paid into the post-office for it, can be considered a true measure of the value of your invaluable paper. For although the money you receive for it is good money, being kept at par with gold by the government's promis to redeem, and our faith in its ability to redeem all its obligations with that precious metal which is recognized in commercial transactions among all nations, peoples, and tongues (with the possible exception of Colorado and Kansas), as the only standard of value, and although you may consider yourself well paid for your labor and expense, yet the true value of your paper to the people of this nation and of the world, like the value of the labors of that greatest and best of men, Thomas Paine, can never be fully known.

What Thousands of Liberals Need.

YORK, NEB., May 25, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I hav wished for some time to send a letter to the "Friends" column to thank Mr. Putnam, of Gibbon, Neb., for so kindly remembering my interest in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav received a paper every week since the first of April. Mr. Putnam's daughter lived in my family for two months and I feel almost acquainted with him.

I see by your issue of May 19th that the question of the Ingersoll home and college is again being brought before the people. I for one am strongly in favor of such an organization, and would do what little I could to help in the matter. I want to place my boy, thirteen years old, in a home or college this fall if possible and it would suit me so much better to place him in the hands of Liberals, on the same principle that a church member would prefer her own denominational school. If any of your readers know of a place where one would receive only moral training they will confer a favor on me by mentioning the matter. I hope in a short time to be able to order the book, "Right Living," by Miss Wixon.

Again thanking Mr. Putnam for his kindness, I am, Yours for truth,

LUCY A. BELL.

On the Picket Line of the Corps.

WASHINGTON, D. C , May 20, 1894

MR. EDITOR: I am in hearty sympathy with the idea of a Letter-Writing Corps, so timely suggested and aptly explained in your issue of May 5th by Mr. Groh, of New Orleans. I imagin that the effect of the intellectual missils upon the first target you named—the House Committee on Education—was salutary, judging from the reply I received from the chairman of that committee the other day, when I asked him whether any consideration of the bill has been had by the committee. Said he: "No; and none likely to be soon. There does not seem to be any demand for its consideration."

No immediate danger need be apprehended by our friends as to either the Kyle-Johnson or Gallinger-Morse bill during the present session; but we here at the "seat of the disease" will keep our eyes and ears open to any attack, front or flank, that might be made by the enemies of freedom and will sound the alarm quickly, and we know that General Putnam, like his illustrious prototype of Revolutionary fame, will beard the fanatical wolves in their den whenever called upon, wherever he may be. Your correspondent is at close range with this particular target, and will fire away orally. But he stands ready to obey orders with his pen when ever another target is pointed out by the captain of the corps. A. J. BOYER.

A Recruit for Dr. "Ned's" Company.

NEW YORK, May 3, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I take great pleasure in inclosing herewith $3 for renewal of my subscription to your paper. In doing so, I take occasion to remark that I hav been converted since I last renewed—converted to vegetarianism. I read an article in the Popular Science Monthly last fall, written by a lady, on this subject, which made a deep impression on my mind. I thought I would giv it a test, and must say that I think it a good thing so far. I hav no desire to eat any meat and do not intend to as long as I can get plenty of vegetables, grains, and fruits. Is it not a shame and disgrace that animals are brought into the world and when they get a taste of the joys of life they are cut off by the cruel hand of man to gratify a gross and beastly appetite? There are plenty of ways to satisfy the hunger of man without resorting to this arbarous practice. He who claims to hav an immortal soul should hav enough of justice and pity in his heart to giv those a little below him in intelligence a chance at life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness during the short time they are to stay on this earth. It is to be hoped that humanity will at some time be educated up to the point of doing no hurt to his fellow-man nor to any living creature which he has brought into the world to minister to his comfort and happiness.

Very truly yours, JOHN C. ROE.

One Law, One Throne, One Altar.

ATCHISON, KAN., May 1, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: As I hav changed my location since I last wrote you, I will again pen you a few lines. If there is one thing I love and esteem, it is the grand old TRUTH SEEKER. May its pages ever be the bulwark to defend us against the artificial and arbitrary institutions that fanatics and men void of reason and principle are endeavoring to fasten upon society. What mortal can dare refuse to his fellow that which nature givs him? O fellow Liberals! let us work to banish all tyranny and all discord; let us form but one society, one great and happy family; and, since human nature has but one constitution, let there exist in future but one law, that of nature; but one code, that of reason; but one throne, that of justice; but one altar, that of union. Impostors are rising on every hand who assume to be the confidants of God, and who, certifying themselvs as teachers of the people, hav opened the ways of falsehood and iniquity; they are working to destroy the fair fame of this grand republic. Oh, who can enumerate all the foolish and calamitous acts of which a priest-ridden government can be guilty? The evils of to-day spring from cupidity and ignorance; men will never cease to be persecuted till they become enlightened and wise; till they practice justice, founded on a knowledge of their relations and of the laws of their organization. That infernal human wretch at Wichita who said he "would like to see Bob Ingersoll stretched upon a rack; would like to see the thumbscrews applied and twisted so tight that every struggle would stain the instruments with his blood," is a type of the Christian monks who dress in black and white, who advance with a standard on which are printed pincers, gridirons, lighted fagots, and the words "justice," "charity," "mercy." "We must," say they, "make an example of these impious wretches and torture them for the glory of God." This, then, is the religion of peace, that meek and beneficent system which you so much extol! This is that evangelical charity which combats Infidelity with persuasiv mildness and repays injuries with patience! Ye hypocrits! it is thus that ye deceive mankind, thus that ye propagate your accursed errors! It is thus ye preach liberty, toleration, and good will toward your fellow-man.

Friends of the Liberal cause: Let us do a fearless work in behalf of humanity. Let each and everyone lay the ax at the root of this upas of iniquity—this blight on human progress.

May the good cause go on.

Some Samples of Superstition.

ST. LOUIS, MO., May 18, P. M. 294.

MR. EDITOR: I hav before me a Catholic work entitled, "Duty of the Christian Before God," which is full of so many manifest absurdities that I wonder if there are any educated persons who really and conscientiously believe such things. I herewith submit a few specimens of Catholic "enlightenment." The book was "designed for the use of parochial schools":

EXAMPLE.—A certain impious man, as pert in his demeanor as he was shallow in his reasoning, one day presented himself at the house of M. Oudin, a learned and pious ecclesiastic. "Sir," said he abruptly, "I am very happy to tell you that I am an Atheist." At these words the man of God drew back in horror, and taking hold of a spy-glass which lay near, he fixed his eye on the young coxcomb. "What are you about there?" demanded the latter. "I am examining that strange being which they call Atheist, for I hav never seen one before." Disconcerted and abashed by these words, the young man hastily withdrew.

The "example" here presented is a gross absurdity. Who ever heard of an Atheist being "disconcerted and abashed" by such an "argument"? It is too ridiculous for consideration and I don't believe there is a word of truth in it.

Here is a choice excerpt from this Catholic guide to salvation. In defining blasphemy it says:

It is blaspheming religion to turn it into ridicule, to blame its practices, to speak ill of the sacred scriptures, etc., etc. Then there · · · is the blasphemy of the fool who said in his heart, "There is no God." This is a horrible, an execrable sin, and deserving of the most terrible punishment.

Italics are mine.

Again the author goes on to say:

Blasphemers are no longer stoned to death, nor are their tongues pierced; but let them not triumph the more of that, for the time of chastisment will soon come, when they, wretches that they are, shall receive the punishment due to such crimes.

Note carefully the threatening language of that paragraph. What does it mean? Does it mean that the Catholic church would set up an Inquisition in this country and do the stoning and tongue-piercing and perhaps burning of heretics if they had the power? Does it not sound harsh and savage? It is a sample of what we may expect if that church ever gains control of the institutions of this country and the Protestants hav placed God in the Constitution. Here is another sample of what Catholic children are stuffed with:

Some years ago, a youth named Gustavus, who had scarcely attained his sixteenth year, was found dead in his chamber, having put an end to his own existence. The unhappy boy had become disgusted with the world, though barely entering on its career. What could hav led him to commit that rash act—that fearful crime? It was incredulity—unbelief. From the age of fifteen he had been what is called a Freethinker. His father had said: "When my son has passed the age of childhood, I will hav him choose his religion and his God." The time for the choice was come, and the unhappy youth chose for himself—death. O unhappy son! unhappy father!

What do you think of that for a barefaced lie? That's the kind of stuff they pounded into my head when I was a boy. Here is another extract which I classify as a lie:

Fathers and mothers, masters and mistresses, if you see a bad book in the hands of your children, of your pupils, or servants, hav, at least, as much zeal as Diderot—is that too much to ask of you? Snatch, then, even as he did, snatch with indignation from the hands of that young person the book in which religion is not treated with respect. And yet it was his own work that the unbeliever would not suffer his daughter to handle. It might hav been said to him: "If your doctrin is fatal, as you appear to acknowledge, why spread it abroad among men? Why diffuse throughout the great human family a poison which you considered deadly as regarded your own?"

If the church is founded on truth, why are the priests afraid of rational works? Can the truth be hurt by all the books ever written? Why are they afraid of investigation? Did not Paul say: "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good"? It is owing to such teachings as the above that Catholics will not investigate, will not reason outside of their own creed. They are taught to shun as vipers all who speak against the church and its doctrins. And such has been my experience with many of them. I will close with two more "examples" from this eminently pious work:

Under the old dispensation the profanation of the Sabbath was punished with death; for not only did God command that a man who was found picking up wood in the desert on the Sabbath should be stoned to death, but he said again to Moses: "Speak to the children of Israel, and say unto them: Observe my Sabbath, because it must be kept holy; he who violates it shall suffer death; if any one labor on the Sabbath, he shall be cut off from the midst of you; six days shall ye labor, but the seventh is the Sabbath, the day of rest, consecrated to the Lord; whosoever shall do any work on that day shall be put to death" Ex. xxxi).

One Sunday, Father C —, being in one of the Marian Islands, was passing along the seashore on his way to visit a sick person. He saw some Indians, who had been baptized, working very busily at some boats they had been making and asked them if there were not other days in the week to do such work, or how it came that they were thus transgressing the divine precept which commands the keeping holy the Lord's day, by abstaining from all servil work, and employing it in the practices and exercises of Christian piety. They savagely answered that such was their will and pleasure. The priest went on his way; but in a few hours after, when returning from his visit, he passed by the same place and found the boats and the shed wherein they had been kept all reduced to ashes. The Indians who had paid so little attention to his remonstrances were now covered with confusion and profuse in their expressions of lively and sincere repentance.

What do you think of that?

Money Stamped on Metal a Fraudulent Perpetual Debt.

GRAND MOUND, IA., April 30, 1894.

MR. JOHN PECK, Dear Sir: Notwithstanding your masterly presentation of the "intrinsic value" humbug, which appeared in a recent issue of the veritable TRUTH SEEKER, certain positions assumed therein by you need ventilation and explanation; hence this letter.

The first bad break I find is your assumption that the "difference between the bullion value and the money value ($2.17) is never redeemed." And you follow it up with the astonishing declaration: "Yet no one has ever lost one cent by the arrangement; it has caused a loss to no one." I am at a loss to account for this lapse or limp in your logic—whether it was a slip of the pen, a superficial view of the money question, or some other cause. At all events, if you can prove your assertion, then the industrial elements hav no case, and it is good-bye, John, to the dream so long indulged in by the humanitarian and philanthropist that the toiler would some day secure his liberty and freedom from the imposition of a tax to support a privileged class.

With regard to the redemption of that value which you say "has been blown into the bullion by act of Congress," all who are posted in the teachings of the new school of financiers regard money as simply public credit regardless of the material or substance upon which it is coined, stamped, or printed. The legal-tender law is the money function and is equivalent to a promis on the part of our citizens, through their representativs, to pay, or redeem, money in labor or its products. Hence when our agents stamp dollars on bullion, silk, paper, or vellum, they simply transfer the credit of the entire wealth-producing element of the nation to the material selected. Dollars are simply units in the ascending or descending scale of debts and credits. Our government officials hav no bullion, but hav persisted, since 1792, in stamping our credit on the bullion held and owned by individuals and corporations free, gratis, without consideration. Now, as it is impossible to transfer credit to any substance without creating its opposit, debt, it will be seen that Congress creates, by so-called law, a fraudulent perpetual debt, to the amount of every dollar which it coins for the bullionists on metal. Hence, while I emphatically deny that there is any "money value" whatever in such an "arrangement," it is susceptible of the clearest proof that every dollar of this law-created debt (amounting, up to June 30, 1872, to $859,270,962.47) has "been paid or redeemed" again and again by the wealth-producers with their labor and products, while the holders of said debt (or money) invariably fix or establish the price of said labor and products.

But this is only the tap root of this system of legalized robbery, which, through the Tory element, led on by Hamilton, we inherited from monarchical England.

At the time officials of the national government commenced stamping or coining this vast amount of money, and issuing it to the bullionists or bankers, we find that, aside from this money debt (which was due to the banker), they had involved the nation in a public debt quoted at $77,227,924 66. And from the birth of the nation down to 1877 Congress has levied taxes to the tune of $2,300,000,000 to pay interest (usury) to those who hold this public credit which was transferred by law, so-called, but which is in direct conflict with our fundamental law.

Now, friend Peck, with the true idea of what constitutes money clearly established in the mind, it will be seen that the above sums to hav been stolen by law from the wealth-producers, hence it is a direct loss to all who hav sold their labor or products and taken this law-created debt in exchange. According to the best thought I can bring to bear on the subject, all the value there is in money rests solely upon three contingencies: First, it must bear the stamp or impress of Uncle Sam, be stamped on paper, issued annually to defray all necessary expenses of the national government, and declared legal tender for all dues and demands. Second, it must be redeemed at its face in labor and its products. Third, it must effect an equitable exchange of said labor and products. Yes, "Congress has the constitutional right to coin or stamp money," "to regulate the value thereof, to pay the debts," and issue it to all who perform any service or labor for the government; and it is the duty of Congress to tax us $16 a day and perquisits for each of its members, and issue said money for such purpose just as long as we hav no better sense than to clamor for some one to govern us. "But where on earth or in heaven or that other place can they go" to find any "constitutional right" or authority to coin money and issue it free to any class, clique, syndicate, banking fraternity, or bullionist? "The thing cannot be did." The act is clearly usurpation. But they do it "allee samee," and then everything in sight is taxed "out of sight" to pay interest (tribute) to the holders of this gratuity.

In conclusion, allow me to say that our experience as a nation proves conclusivly that stealing by or in accordance with law is tenfold more disastrous and far-reaching in its dire results upon society than stealing in opposition to law. The idea that there is any necessity for Congress to tax any citizen to pay interest on public credit for public use to another citizen, or to a corporation, is too ridiculous and absurd to be entertained for a moment by any civilized person who has any sympathy or humanity in his make-up or any regard for justice, equal rights and privileges. The simple truth of the matter is, all this babel and jargon concerning intrinsic value, precious metals, redeeming money by swapping dollars, fiat money, gold basis, parity between gold and silver, and money that is good in "Yurrup," originated in the fertil brain of those who hav been thus pensioned by law upon the toilers in order to deceive the masses and make them think money is real wealth, which "pays a debt," and thus perpetuate their power, prestige, and reign, if you please, through "dividends and pershents." All who, like Brother Roscoe, hav given the subject of finance a "profound" study know that what he calls "government" is a perpetual pauper that must be supported by the wealth-producers; hence "the province of money is to discharge" our obligations to all who perform any service for the public. And every dollar said government transfers free to the bullionists, or other outside parties, and all money that is withdrawn from circulation by the government is a virtual imposition of double taxation, which must be discharged in labor and its products, which alone pay all debts.

Au revoir! C. DUTTON.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Sleep.

We all must sleep
Some side by side,
Other inlands afar:
Some 'neath the tide;
But sleep we must,
Just and unjust.
Though when, and where, and how,
In days or months or years none now
May know, nor time nor reckoning keep;
'Twill come upon us unaware,
This unsought sleep.
To close
Our eyes to earthly things,
To life and love and those
Who, seeing that we wake not, weep,
Sad, silent, and mysterious sleep!

Another name it hath, but here
Let not that name appear;
It filleth us with dread;
Leave it unsaid.
Fearful and fateful word,
Some day it must be heard,
And wring the heart,
Whilst lips a-tremble frame
The dreaded name.
"Sleep," say we then,
For sleep we must,
Just and unjust,
Nor wake again,
And so, man born of woman, keep
Thy pillow ready, and a whitened gown
Wherein to robe thyself, ere thou lie down
To thy last sleep.

A Visit to San Gabriel.

Meeting Mrs. F. D. C., at the Southern Pacific railway station by appointment, the day following our trip to Pasadena, we rode out to San Gabriel, a little town in the valley celebrated for its old mission church, which was built of adobe by the Franciscan fathers in 1781. The first orange grove in California, it is said, was planted here by the same old fathers a hundred years ago. An old grape vine, which was also planted by these mission fathers, still grows and bears fruit in the rear of the old adobe hotel. They brought the cuttings from Spain, and the fruit is still known as the "mission grape." The old padres here first made wine for their own use, for who ever saw a padre that did not like wine?

The old church with its four big bells is antique, but not more curious than any other church. A notice on the door read: "Call at the priest's house," which we obeyed, and in response to our rap there came to the door an old Spanish woman who seemed not to be able to speak English and handed us a note which, deciphered, read: "Church builit in 1781. Twenty-five cents admission." "Twenty-five cents to see the inside of that old adobe? No," said Yokohama. "Rather giv two-bits to the children. Come away." The old Spanish duenna looked dismayed and angry as we walked on, noting the different roses that clambered to the top of the house, the humming-bird in the honeysuckle, and the geranium ten feet high and the air of stillness all about. The inhabitants hav the most listless and the sleepiest aspect—at least, those we saw did. We called on the Mexicans in their huts and played with the babies, all idle and good-natured as the blooming roses. I remarked that the folks were like lilies—toiling not nor spinning—but yet they were not arrayed like these glorious blossoms. Still they were decently appareled. The saloons—and we noted several—seemed to be thriving, but we saw no drunkenness, and we learned that there are only two policemen in San Gabriel. We chatted with more Mexican women who were washing under a tree, and these were the only workers we saw. Their babies cried when they saw us and we gave them the nickels the church wanted.

After a little talk with a man who used to take the Boston Investigator and admired Ingersoll, we wandered on to a field where there were some old adobe ruins, and I wrecked my gown in getting through a barbed-wire fence, but did not mind it when we called at a pretty frame house for a needle and thread with which to mend the rents in my garment and there made the acquaintance of a handsome and accomplished Spanish girl, whose genial and quiet self-possession would hav done honor to a princess. She was well educated and spoke fine English, but her mother was unable to speak any language but Spanish. When we left she gave us each great bonquets of lovely roses, and we were sorry to say adios to the pretty picture that the fair maiden and her proud father made as they stood together in the yard. We shall not see her again, but we will long remember her fair face and pleasant manners.

It would take too much time to tell you how we ate our lunch that day, but you would laugh, I am sure, to know just how it was.

We inspected the old, old-fashioned, beehive-shaped oven of an old Mexican, who tried to explain how bread is baked in such a concern. His adobe hut had no windows and is very low in the walls, but no doubt is comfortable and keeps out the rain, when it does rain. What more can anyone want?

We passed one low little shanty, whose rough door was trimmed with black and white cambric. "How pathetic," we said. "Death has been here, there is the symbol, and hearts hav ached, even in this rude adobe."

Inquiry revealed that a daughter had died in the house and the burial had taken place a week before. But the father had been so much intoxicated since that he had forgotten to remove the funeral trimmings.

"Why," said our informant, "I went to a wake here not long ago—yes, a wake. An infant had died, and we all carried something cheerful, like wine, cigarets, and the like o' that. Well, what do you think, there was mirth and a regular jig danced around the little dead baby. Why, they're glad when a kid like that dies. I tell ye 'tis true. There is one less mouth to feed. Just think of it! Why, even the beasts in the field mourn for the dead; and I say that human beings are worse than brutes a good many times." We could not dispute the statement.

We rested in the old adobe hotel, whose walls were two feet and a half in thickness. There are few permanent or transient guests here, but many come from day to day and hav regular Spanish dinners.

Here we saw a man from the East who disappeared from his Eastern home twenty-five years ago and has since lived in California, having had no communication with home and friends in all that time. They probably think he is dead and no doubt hav regretted his untimely fate in a foreign land. Yet, here he is in San Gabriel.

After more frolics with the Mexican girls, who could only say one word in English and that was "Yes," and they answered yes to everything, we strolled along toward the station, for it was nearly train time. Passing the old church again, behold, the door was opened and visitors were inside. "Come on," said Yokohama, "here's our chance." The priest was explaining to his visitors while we stood behind, laughing at his unconsciousness of our presence. There really was nothing in particular to see there, only pictures, the altar, and Catholic images.

"Those old priests—ah, they manage to get the best of everything, don't they?" And then Yokohama, with a roguish laugh, said, "But they didn't get the best of us though." We mounted the outer stone stairway and looked away out on a beautiful picture and queried whether the place was named in honor of Gabriel of trumpet fame and if it was expected that sometime the old saint would sound his trumpet from the top of the old mission church.

Correspondence.

WATERLOO, IND., April 4, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is is my first letter to the Children's Corner. I hav been going to write long before this. I will be eight years old June 12th.

My aunt Lizzie has a little baby girl not a week old. I think they are going to name her Ruth or Maude. She has black hair. My home is in Waterloo, with my grandpa and grandma.

I hav just one little sister. I went to school in Jackson, but I don't think I will go to school here for a while. I was in the second grade. My teacher's name was Miss Weiger.

My grandpa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I like to read the letters that children hav written. He thinks it is the best paper that is published.

I will close, hoping this will be worthy of a place in the Children's Corner.

HARIETTE M. DILLA

BUNDYSBURG, June 1, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: If you will permit, I desire to advise all yonng students of Freethought to purchase the "Age of Reason." This will knock all Bible inspiration deaf and dumb. Then purchase Keeler's "Short History of the Bible." Then Waite's History, and by this time their minds will be stored with irrefutable arguments against Christianity. Now, little folks, go to work. Whom are you indebted to for your liberty, political and religious? Thomas Paine.

B. O. FENTON.

BURLINGTON, IA., April 22, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my third letter to the Corner, and hope it is not the last. We hav nine schools in Burlington, besides two colleges and the German and Swede schools.

I hav got a little sister two months old. Her name is Eva Clark Mosena. We hav had nice weather all spring. The population of Burlington is thirty thousand.

Well, as my letter is getting long, I will close, hoping to see this in print. I remain,

Your friend, DAISY P. E. MOSENA.

SARATOGA, WY., March 21, 1894.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON AND READERS OF THE CORNER: This is my first letter. Papa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since it began, and hopes to till it stops. In Saratoga we hav two churches. I hav never been inside of one in my life. Papa has not been inside of one since 1866, and the last time mamma was in one was in 1880. They offered to make papa deacon if he would join the church, but it was no inducement. The church people let us alone. They know better than to ask us for anything. I liv out in the mountains on a farm of twelve hundred acres, forty-five miles from the railroad, sixteen miles from a post-office, three miles from a school-house, and about three miles from a neighbor. From our house we can see mountains on every side. We are twelve miles from the Divide, the backbone of the Rocky mountains. Papa takes us up there hunting in summer. We raise horses, cattle, hay, and grain, and small fruits. It is one of the highest cultivated ranches in Wyoming. The elevation is 7,550. We liv on a creek all by ourselvs called Calf Creek. I hav one brother, Frankie, and a sweet baby sister. I am twelve years old, and would like to correspond with some of the other readers of the Corner very much. I hav the "Story Hour." It is just lovely. Our school begins in May. Frankie and I drive in a cart. I would like to join the Liberal Correspondence Club, but I am not old enough yet. As my letter is getting long I will close now, remaining your Liberal friend, MAUDE W. JONES.

Marry This Girl - Somebody!

MR. EDITOR:

I stained a blue silk dress with lemon juice; what will restore the color? I am making lots of money selling the Climax Dish Washer. Have not made less than $10 any day I worked. Every family want a Dish Washer, and pay $5 quickly when they see the dishes washed and dried perfectly in one minute. I generally sell at every house. It is easy selling what every family wants to buy. I sell as many washers as my brother, and he is an old salesman. I will clear $3 000 this year. By addressing J. H. Nolen, 60 W. Third Ave., Columbus, Ohio, any one can get particulars about the Dish Washer, and can do as well as I am doing.

Talk about hard times; you can soon pay off a mortgage, when making $10 a day, if you will only work; and why won't people try, when they have such good opportunities? MAGGIE R.

A CHANCE TO MAKE MONEY.

I have berries, grapes, and peaches, a year old, fresh as when picked. I use the California Cold Process; do not heat or seal the fruit, just put it up cold, keeps perfectly fresh, and costs almost nothing; you can put up a bushel in ten minutes. Last week I sold directions to over 120 families; anyone will pay a dollar for directions, when they see the beautiful samples of fruit. As there are many people poor like myself, I consider it my duty to give my experience to such, and feel confident anyone can make one or two hundred dollars round home in a few days. I will mail sample of fruit and complete directions to any of your readers, for eighteen two-cent stamps, which is only the actual cost of the samples, postage, etc., to me.

THE THE

THE CONFLICT BETWEEN MENTAL SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY.

By EDGAR C. BEALL, M.D.,

with a preface by

R. G. INGERSOLL.

This is the only work of its kind in the literature of Freethought. Its arguments are based upon scientific phrenology, and appeal directly to the reader's sense of logic and love of justice. It is eloquent as well as convincing.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A Nineteenth Century Novel.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Col. R. G. Ingersoll's ARGUMENT

IN THE

Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,

At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

APOLLONIUS OF TYANA IDENTIFIED AS THE CHRISTIAN JESUS.

An important and remarkable revelation concerning the life and times of Apollonius of Tyana, the great sage and philosopher of the first century. It is here claimed that his life and teachings were appropriated and utilized by the formulators of the Christian religion in the interest of so-called Christianity. The plagiarism is made plain in this brief history of Apollonius, especially in view of the historical references and comments thereon. It is quite evident that to conceal the plagiarism, the name of Apollonius was suppressed.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

A Liberal living in Michigan said once that he would give $25 a year to have the Crimes of Preachers recorded, as the frequent lapses of virtue of the ministers showed how little value Christianity possesses to make men moral.

We have just issued the Fourth Edition of the book doing this. The additions for this new edition of the

"Crimes of Preachers"

shows nearly 400 cases of ministerial conduct. While those in previous editions show that within a few years about

of one kind or another of criminal conduct. Most of the crimes are against women, for the fair sex are at once the weakness and the strength of the church—"the church" meaning of course the clergy.

Notwithstanding the many additional pages, we have kept the price the same, 25 cents. Send for a copy, and confound the churchmen. Show them just what sort of scamps are the clergy who have closed the World's Fair on Sunday, because it is so holy a day that to look upon machinery or paintings in this period is "immoral."

PEN PICTURES OF THE WORLD'S FAIR.

It is, besides being a complete Guide-Book, the best description of the Fair yet given—poetic, beautiful, accurate. RELIGION A CURSE, RELIGION A DISEASE, RELIGION A LIE.

By Samuel P. Putnam.

Dedicated to the American Congress, of 1892, which for the sake of Religion, Stabbed Liberty to the Heart.

A work burning with indignation inspired by the Congressional act closing the World's Fair on Sunday—an act which practically united the government and the Christian church.

To which is added Mr. Putnam's address delivered before the Columbian Exposition Committee of the House of Representatives against Sunday closing.

Also the following Essays and Poems by Mr. Putnam, which have never before been put in book form: Orthodoxy; Freethought; Man, Not God (written for a Paine anniversary); The Statue of Liberty and Thomas Paine; a poem written for the opening exercises of the Silverton, Ore., Freethought Hall; Death and Life; The Golden Age; Shut the Door (a poem on the closing of the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia, in 1876).

The main essay in this work is one of the strongest arraignments ever made of the religion which cramps and fetters the minds of the people of this country. It should be distributed widely. It has been commended in the highest terms as it appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER and we hope every reader will buy a copy to lend his neighbor and arouse thought.

PEBBLES FROM THE PATH OF A PILGRIM. By Harriet B. Hastings Boston: H. L. Hastings. Cloth, Illus., Price $1.50.

These pious stories—printed on very heavy paper, with extra wide margins, and attractivly bound in blue, with back and side titles in silver and white—are not particularly appetizing or nutritious reading for healthy men and women. No doubt Mrs. Hastings feels deeply for the suffering and is ready to help them as best she can, but her extreme credencivness makes her a very unsafe guide for the young. She evidently has a most devout faith in "Providence," seeing in the simplest coincidences which result in advantage to her or her family or friends the special interposition of the hand of God. Upon the whole, the book is morbid and unhealthful in tone, and reeks with superstition.

IS THE BIBLE A REVELATION FROM GOD? Dialogs Between a Skeptic and a Christian. By Charles T. Gorham. London: Watts & Co. Cloth. Price, 75 cents.

This is a calm, dispassionate, conservativ examination of the various claims made by those defenders of the Bible who assert that it is a direct and unerring revelation from a God of infinit wisdom, goodness, and power. The champions of opposing views are old fellow-students in a Bible class, who hav met after a separation of some years, the Agnostic having the evening before listened to an address by the Christian at a mission hall. The latter talks like many others who in these days try to separate primitiv from historical Christianity, and who, as they think, are able to discriminate between "churchism" and the "true faith" as God has revealed it. He says:

"I belong to no denomination whatever. I am simply a Christian believer, deriving my faith from the word of God direct. I do not believe in man-made creeds, church councils, infallible popes, Westminster Confessions, or Thirty-nine Articles. I take my stand upon the revelation of God given to man in Jesus Christ, as recorded in holy scripture."

From this point of view Ainslie defends Christianity and Franklin criticises it. Among the special subjects discussed are "The 'authorized' and the 'revised' versions," "divine inspiration," "faith," "reason," "The ways of God," "God's treatment of the Egyptians," "progressiv revelation," "verbal inspiration," "defect of argument from analogy," "object of the apparent cruelty," "the Jewish Sabbath," "divine and human morality," "witchcraft," "Christ's knowledge not perfect," "the miraculous conception," "the inspiration of the gospels," "the temptation," "eternal punishment," etc. We hav space for only a few of the titles. The work is a good one to put into the hands of a man who is willing to read both sides. Some will do that who could not be persuaded to examin an ex parte argument against a cherished creed.

THE NEW AGE OF REASON. By Augustus Watters, Author of "The Vale of Ramapo," "A Newark Knight," etc. Newark, N. J. Paper. Price, 50 cents.

This lively and logical little book is a collection of poetry and prose, beginning with a poem on Giordano Bruno and ending with an invocation to Ernst Haeckel. Mr. Watters shows how little the God idea can help us, in this striking passage: "A God beyond the reach of reason would be of no service to man whatever. On this account theologians constantly fall back on the humanity of Christ, and even hail it as his crowning attribute." All who are familiar with Christian arguments will smile at this neat characterization: "According to faith, the good which Christians do is not done by the man but by the Christian; but the evil which Christians do is not done by the Christian but by the man."

"The New Age of Reason" is largely a summary and concise exposition of the ideas of Ludwig Feuerbach, as expressed in his "Essence of Religion," and "Essence of Christianity." Here is a choice thought: "The work of reason, in relation to religion, is to destroy an illusion, and an illusion which is profoundly injurious. Supernaturalism in theory becomes antinaturalism in practice. In short, we need only to invert the religious relations and the unclouded light of truth streams in upon us." Here is a paragraph which will well bear quotation: "Professor Caird says that without a knowledge of God religion is impossible [commended to those modern Christians who try to prove that religion is conduct]; because when we admit that he is unknowable we, in fact, admit that he is (to us) nonexistent. A more devout believer in a God never lived than Thomas Paine. Like Job, he declared that God was everywhere visible in the material world. But the sad truth is that he is nowhere visible in the material world. Outside the mind of man there is no God. Nature, the only conceivable personality besides man, has neither reason nor feeling, and the long history of the animate kingdom is the history of suffering and death. The fact that the sun shines alike upon the evil and the good shows that nature has no more regard for a saint than for a demon."

Of the terrible evils resulting from permitting the brains of the children to be poisoned by religious teachings our author says: "Here are the brains of the men and women of the future hopelessly warped, and false ideas are implanted which not all the scientists in the world will be able ever after to remove. Even the splendid intellect of a man like Byron was irretrievably injured by the lurid imaginings of an old Scotch nurse. And Cowper, who wrote that noble phrase, 'I would not number in my list of friends the man who wantonly sets foot upon a worm,' died in an asylum, from the effect of imbibing John Calvin's views on predestination. The father of the assassin of Garfield was a Bible lunatic, and the son, who was a member of the Young Men's Christian Association, simply followed in his tracks." We confess ourselvs wholly unable to understand the mental processes by which Freethinking parents justify themselvs in sending their children to religious schools. Such conduct fills us with inexpressible pain and horror. Why should the plastic brain of the innocent child be thus bound in the compress of a fossil creed, its moral and emotional nature be exposed to the deadly contagion of hypocrisy and antinaturalism? Why?

"The New Age of Reason" is a book well worth reading.

The test of worth in literature lies in proving the degree to which an author has carried out a definit, well-considered purpose. The value of a book, in a general sense, depends of course on the depth of the purpose and the scope of its applicability as made possible in its expression. Helen Gardener has already proven the keenness of her perceptions in the pointing out of the salient features needing attack and attention in our modern problems; she has proven her broad logical capacity in the vigorous consistency with which she has presented phases of these problems to the public; and the wide reading accorded them proves her exceptional power for attraction and impression—for her works hav accomplished a vast deal of good.

She has covered broad grounds and has treated them most forcefully. But on some grounds nothing that she has ever done will equal in eloquence her presentation of our civil war problem as given us in her new volume, "An Unofficial Patriot." Not in so many words does she discuss all sides of the question, but the spirit of the author pervades with its consciousness all reference with such infinit power that the question as a whole touches magically the consciousness of the reader and opens it to the perception of the grand philosophical foundations of the author's convictions. In its scope and power it is unrivaled among war stories It embodies so forcefully the soul of the whole matter. Others hav recorded facts and hav given interpretations and prophecies, varying in breadth and power; but Helen Gardener's treatment is from the standpoint of the self-conscious soul viewing its own conditions and phases of expression after having attained knowledge through experience. This self-conscious soul being the progressiv body of those struggling days in which the spirit of freedom was striving for expression in the only avenues then open to its surging tide.

The central character, Griffith Davenport, is a grand type of the progressed manhood of those days. A Virginian slave owner by inheritance, a Methodist clergyman by conviction, a broad thinker by nature, a nobleman at heart, the picture of his life is an inspiring one, and most eloquently detailed. Helen Gardener is herself a Virginian, therefore the masterly depiction of the conscience-problem of the unselfish, truehearted Southerners who wished to do what was right and yet who had not the heart to cast their slaves into the deplorable conditions alone allowed them by the laws of their own and of Northern states—a sort of non-existence—will be appreciated for its faithfulness to actualities. The whole Southern problem is laid out clearly before the eyes of the mind, with the general and he personal elements most delightfully elaborated. The quality of pleasure afforded, it is indeed difficult to express; but the book is so perfectly the expression of united spirit, soul, and body that all natures will both enjoy and appreciate the flavor of its power as a soul-picture. The character-sketch of Abraham Lincoln will giv a keen pleasure to every patriotic mind and heart—illustrating so well the great leader's devotion to the Union!

From its opening chapter and throughout, the book is weighted with beauty and power—all simply narrated but spiritedly imbued with that earnestness of knowledge whose brush dips deeply into a pigment of which the merest touch is a life-color—sure, firm, glowing. Helen Gardener's "An Unofficial Patriot" paints the truest of world-patriots, and the story thereof is in every sense delightful.

The publishers hav printed the book with their accustomed care. The general effect is that of artistic clearness—always resultant in attractivness for every reader. The copy before us is of sage-green, neatly titled in silver.—Boston Ideas.

Gems of Thought.

TRY to fit a hand with five fingers into a glove with four. Your difficulty aptly parallels the difficulty of putting a complex conception into a mind not having a proportionately complex faculty.—Herbert Spencer.

THERE is a great peril in having morality made an appendage of a set of theological mysteries, because the mysteries are sure, in time, to be dragged into the open air of reason, and moral truth crumbles away with the false dogmas with which it had got mixed.—John Morley.

AND, I pray you, with a view to the future, near and remote, let not so real a thing as marriage hav aught to do with such a sham thing as a priest. Let not so holy thing as love touch such an unholy and meanly mercenary thing as a flamen who mutters over a ritual of bondage for fees. If a marriage be perpetrated by a priest for lucre, what marvel if for lucre it eventuate in prostitution? Keep away from that divinest of all obligations, matrimony, all taint of the dross of the metal of your smelting-pot. Children born of those who come together for caste are as hard and inhuman as a half-crown, as unspiritual and uninteresting as a pawnbroker's ledger.—Saladin.

THAT the individual may reach the highest expression of his power, he must develop that which is part of his own nature. Each and all of you should learn to value and to use your own individuality. If in your youth you try to put it from you, so as to pare yourselvs down to a sort of common denominator, you come as near as may be to the intellectual standard of that "base Indian" who "threw a pearl away richer than all his tribe." The fable of the fox who lost his tail is not merely a nursery myth; it has its analog in those persons of to-day who try to persuade the men and women of stronger gifts of individuality than their own to deprive themselvs voluntarily of this superiority.—Henry Irving.

DENOMINATIONS afflict the spirit. They pare down spontaneity and discourage rebellion. The men who hav the denominational temperament giv the institution priority over the principle which was its only excuse for being. Why should not the individual keep the reins in his own hands? If there is to be authority let him choose it. If leaders are required, let him decide hour and person. When the occasion for leadership is past, let the leader retire or be dismissed. Do not giv to his pleasure your eternal welfare. When he would operate you rather than co-operate with you, teach him, even with whip, if need be, that you are master of yourself, and that if he forces you to contend for self-mastery, all power that he compels you to exercise against him is justified.—Horace L. Traubel.

ONLY two theories of the springs of action in humanity hav ever been promulgated. One is the rational theory which we call hedonism, and which rightly recognizes that pleasure and pain are, and must ever be the sole guides of voluntary acts for all sentient beings, be they pigs or philosophers, saints or starfish. The other is the irrational theory taking its origin in theological concepts (though, with cheap imitation thinkers like Carlyle, it often outlivs its source), the theory which maintains that the universe was created by one or more superior beings, who hate pleasure and love pain, or who dispense them by caprice, and who desire that some or all of their creatures should suffer abundantly. This is the theory, so well set forth (though by a smug optimist poet) in Caliban upon Setebos; it lies at the root of all religious thinking, and in its rigorously logical development it is known to us as Calvinism.—Grant Allen.

THE last thing that it would be proper for me to do would be to speak of the work of my life, or to say at the end of the day whether I think I hav earned my wages or not. Men are said to be partial judges of themselvs. Young men may be, I doubt if old men are. Life seems terribly foreshortened as they look back, and the mountain they set themselvs to climb in youth turns out to be a mere spur of immeasurably higher ranges, when, with failing breath, they reach the top. But if I may speak of the objects I hav had more or less definitly in view since I began the ascent of my hillock, they are briefly these: To promote the increase of natural knowledge and to forward the application of scientific methods of investigation to all the problems of life to the best of my ability, in the conviction, which has grown with my growth and strengthened with my strength, that there is no alleviation for the sufferings of mankind excepting veracity of thought and action, and the resolute facing of the world as it is when the garment of make-believe by which pious hands hads hav hidden its uglier features is stripped off.—Professor Huxley.

Not for Parsons.

"COLONEL'S goin' to run for office." "How do you know?" "Bought a barrel o' whisky, gave ten dollars to the orphan asylum, an' painted the church!"—Atlanta Constitution.

DEACON: "I was terribly shocked, my dear, to discover on my way home from church a match game of foot-ball being played on the vacant lot near the park." Wife: "Was it that which makes you so very late, deacon?"—Texas Siftings.

"SAY, uncle Moses, how did de Lawd make de berry fust man?" "Why, he done made him out of de earf, ob de mud; dat's how he made him." "Den w'y doan' he make 'em out o' mud no mo?" "'Cause de Lawd doan' nebber do noffin' extrabagant, my chile. Land aint as cheap as it was for' de war; fust thing you know some white pusson'd buy up all de mud and put a stop to de popperlation, and then where'd we be? De Lawd am the best jedge ob how to go about his own business, an' dey ain't no uster sayin' no mo'."

THE CELTIC ADAM.

An English gentleman, sojourning in the vicinity of Glenadam, made the acquaintance of a "sma' laird" of the neighborhood. While walking through the glen one day the Englishman said: "Pray, Mr. Campbell, can you tell me why this glen is called Glenadam?"

"Oo, ay," was the reply, "I can tell you that; but I thocht it was shenerally kent."

"Indeed. Well, I am in ignorance as to the origin of the name."

The Celt cast a pitying look on the Sassenach, and then, in a tone of deep gravity said: "Adam wass porn here."

He fell back a pace to enjoy the look of amazement on the Englishman's face.

"Adam! What Adam?" asked the stranger.

"Adam, the Adam—the fery first man as wass porn into the world alive, man."

"But, my good sir, I always understood it was in Mesopotamia our first parent arose."

"Och, sir, this iss a popylar error that hass pen redd up long ago. Adam wass porn here in Glenadam, and he wass the first man that spoke the Gaelic."

Highly amused at the implicit faith the laird manifested in this legend, but still preserving his gravity, the Englishman said: "Then, of course, Eve was born here also?"

"No, she wassna. She cam' frae farrer north—aboot Tobermory way."

"Then we are standing now in the Garden of Eden?"

"Deet are we, sir; ant here Adam and Eve lifed fery happy thegither till that nasty affair wi' the serpint. They were neffer like theirsel's efter that. Ant then their auldest laddie, Cain McAdam, went to the bad, an' wass a sair, sair trial to his parents. He went frae bad to worse, till wan day, whan he wass working in the kail-yard wi' his younger brither, he up wi' his spade, and brocht the puir laddie a terrible clamhewit on the head that kilt him deid."

"What a trial to his parents," said the stranger, in a sympathetic tone.

"Deet ye may say tat, sir. The auld wife cried the coronach ower the bairn till she was as roopit as a craw, and wass like to greet the fery een oot o' her heid."

"Naturally."

"Weel, she took to the dram for comfort like, an' her puir man had a terrible time o't wi' her till she ran away wi' an auld packman they ca'd Methusalum."

"Methuseleh was a nativ of the glen also?"

"Hooch na; he was a Paisley body tat traveled wi' winceys o' his ain weavin'."

"And what became of poor Eve, Mr. Campbell?"

"Oigh, oigh, she had an awfu' ent. It was a fine munelight nicht when she took the road wi' the packman, an' when they got to the heid o' the glen her heart failed her, an' she turned round to go back to her guid man when a' at wance she was changed into a pillar o' saut."

"Really, Mr. Campbell, there must be some mistake here."

"No on my side o' the road, sir."

"But we read in Genesis that it was Lot's wife who was so punished for looking back on the cities of the plain."

"Maybe; but that will be made a' richt in the neist version. My ain grandfather minded fine o' the muckle saut rock himsel'."

"And what became of this wonderful pillar?"

"Weel, ye see, saut wass awfu' scarce in the Lews wan year, an' the Shtornaway men cam' ower in their poats an' took it a' awa'; an' they did say that a' the herrin' cured in the Lews that year had a terrible goo o' human flesh. But here ye are at the inn door. Goot-bye."—London Freethinker.

THE HOLY CROSS SERIES.

The Popes and Their Doings. Biographical sketches of the most noted of these vicars of Christ and vicegerents of God, showing what they have done, and what kind of men they were. It contains very plain statements, in very unvarnished language, and the unmasking is complete, proving them to have been cruel, intriguing, and licentious men. Considering the rapid growth of Catholicism in this country, this book cannot be too widely disseminated Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Awful Disclosures of Maria Monk, as exhibited in a narrative of her sufferings dur in her residence of five years as a novice, and two years as a black nun, in the Hotel Dieu Nunnery, at Montreal. Perhaps not any anti Catholic book published has created more excitement, and had such a circulation as this work. To counteract its effects the Catholics circulated a story that Maria Monk was "no better than she should be," but investigation disclosed that her "child of shame" was none other than the child of her priest-seducer Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth 75 cents.

Auricular Confession and Popish Nunneries. By Wm. Hogan, for twenty-five years a confessing priest. A revelation of the licentious practices of the priests and nuns in these religious brothels. There is no question that Ex-priest Hogan knew the truth of the tales of vice, seduction, and infanticide he gives in this volume, and equally there is no question that if the people generally knew of them, Catholicism would not be given the vast amounts of money now allowed it by our various city governments. Price, paper, 50 cents, cloth 75 cents.

The Priest in Absolution. A Review of the system of auricular confession, including copious extracts from the "Confessional Unmasked," from the "Master Key to Popery," etc. The work is a protest against and an appeal to every American citizen to examine carefully and thoughtfully a religious system so invasive of privacy, so powerful for evil in licentious hands, so fraught with danger to female modesty, to the ingenuous openness of youth, and to the freedom of thought, speech and action. Price, paper, 25 cents.

Priestly Celibacy Exposed A lecture by the Rev Geo. Townsend Fox, of Durham, England. Revised American edition, showing the results in parishes of the Roman decree that priests shall not marry. Price, paper, 15 cents.

Sister Lucy and Her Awful Disclosures Respecting New Hall Convent, Boreham, Essex, England. Showing that convents are inimical to chastity, virtue, and freedom. Price, paper, 10 cents.

CONWAY'S EDITION

OF

THE WRITINGS OF THOMAS PAINE.

COLLECTED, EDITED, AND CHRONOLOGICALLY ARRANGED

By MONCURE DANIEL CONWAY.

Author of "The Life of Thomas Paine," "Omitted Chapters of History Disclosed in the Life and Papers of Edmund Randolph," etc.

Four Volumes, Royal Octavo, Gilt Tops, Uniform with the Editor's "Life of Paine" Price per Volume, $2.50.

An edition of one hundred and fifty numbered copies bound in half leather, gilt tops, uniform with the limited editions of "The Writings of Washington," "The Writings of Jefferson," etc. Price, per volume, $4.

For the general reader the $3 edition of Paine's works is sufficient, as it contains all of his writings upon which his fame substantially rests. But for those who desire to go deeper into the subject of the man and polemic we can most unreservedly commend the "Life of Paine" by Mr Conway, and this edition of Paine's works edited by him It is the fullest that we are likely to have, and the student of history, and particularly the writer, should have it upon his shelves.

The work will consist of four volumes, and will be arranged chronologically. The cause of America, as Paine said, made him an author, and the first volume will cover the period of the American Revolution, beginning with the year 1774. It will therefore open with Paine's anti-slavery essay, and his philosophical or moral essays, while editing the Pennsylvania Magazine; these being followed by the great revolutionary, political, and controversial pamphlets which made such a profound impression on the country.

The second volume will consist mainly of the "Rights of Man," and pamphlets relating to English politics, but will also contain certain papers on French affairs.

The third and fourth volumes will consist mainly of Paine's religious writings, but will also contain some essays relating to American affairs, written in his last years. At the close will be given Paine's poems.

The first volume is now ready for delivery, and the others will follow soon Orders for the whole set will be taken and filled as the volumes appear, or the volumes can be purchased separately. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER CO., 28 Lafayette Place, New York.

There will be also songs, recitations, etc. Admission, 10 cents, at the door.

The New York section of the Freethought Letter Writing Corps will continue to present arguments favorable to the taxation of church property to the committees of the Constitutional Convention, the names of whose members are given below. Write to a new name each week:

Mr. S. P. Putnam departed this week upon his extended lecturing trip. Our readers will see by perusing his list of appointments that he will hav to pay heavy tributes to the railroads in order to meet his widely-scattered engagements. He has quite a number of open dates which he will be very glad to hav filled. Work upon "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" is progressing satisfactorily and bills of inconvenient magnitude are coming in with unsatisfactory frequency. The preparation of such a work is a stupendous task, especially when we take into consideration the comparativly few activ Liberals in the country, and the dull times which hav prevailed for so long. Our zealous co-worker has devoted the better part of a year to this epoch-marking volume, at the cost of the nearly total drying-up of the ordinary streams of revenue. To giv him the most moderate wages for his hard but brilliant work at least five hundred more names of paid-in-advance subscribers should go into the closing pages of the great book. It is certainly cheap at $5, and with THE TRUTH SEEKER one year at $6.50 for both is more than cheap. The history will make a splendid companion for your children, and a delightful surprise for your guests, even though some of the latter may be more or less orthodox. Since last reports the names of subscribers given below hav been received. Nine hundred and fifty copies of "Four Hundred Years" hav been ordered and paid for to date. If we can not hav the five hundred additional subscriptions desired to properly reimburse Mr. Putnam, we certainly should hav fifty more, so that the names of the cash takers of one thousand copies can go into the book.

The Taxation of Church Property.

The people who were invited to contribute to our symposium on taxation and did not comply say more than those who hav responded. This statement is not meant as any disparagement of the latter. To presidents and other members of college faculties we sent just one hundred letters of inquiry. We received answers from thirteen of the persons addressed. There are sixty county treasurers in this state. A letter was sent to each. Replies were received from six. Of the thirteen college men who replied two hav failed to form an opinion on the subject of taxation of church property. Only eleven per cent of the educators addressed hav ventured to tell our readers how they stand on the important question of equality in taxation. Ten per cent of the county treasurers hav put themselvs upon record. Of one hundred and sixty men and women holding educational and official positions but nineteen hav acknowledged the receipt of our letters, and but seventeen hav deemed it prudent to let their views be known.

Said we not that those who remain silent speak more powerfully than those who advance arguments either for or against equitable taxation of ecclesiastical property? Why do they shrink from the expression of their opinions—for who can doubt that they hav opinions? What seals their lips or paralyzes their pens? Why should not an honest man giv voice to his candid views on a public question of so much importance if he does not fear harmful results to himself as a punishment for his frankness should he take sides on this question? It is not necessary to point out that these men do not take refuge in silence because they feel they will be boycotted by those who stand for justice in taxation. The fact that church property is exempt and the further fact that but few, comparativly, are working earnestly to get that wealth put on the tax lists, is proof that these educators and officials hav little or nothing to fear from pro-taxationists should they speak out against church deadheadism. It is perfectly fair to assume that the reason they do not answer such plain questions is becames they are in dread of the terrorism of the church. They may be roughly divided into two classes, the first consisting of those who really believe that church property should bear its equitable share of the burdens imposed by the state, but who think that their personal interests would be jeoparded by a frank avowal of their convictions. The second class is composed of anti-taxationists, activ Christians, who feel above defending their position in an Infidel journal, probably thinking, also, that if they should do so they would in some way help advertise the paper and add to the prestige of Freethought. It is well to remark right here that we can hav nothing to say regarding the motivs of those who hav answered our questions in the negativ; we can deal only with their arguments. But those who will not or dare not express their opinions necessarily require different treatment. As they advance no arguments we will be obliged to ask concerning their motivs, and we are forced to the conclusion that those motivs are not creditable either to them or to the ecclesiastical tyranny which forces them to be dumb in the presence of a demand for equality before the law.

Freethinkers who bask in the sunshine of optimism may with profit study this exhibit of professional and political timidity. Certainly the battle for religious freedom is not won, the time has not come to lay down the arms of our warfare for justice, when ninety per cent of the educational and fiscal officers of a great state dare not put themselvs on record concerning so simple an issue as impartial taxation. Of course the college men to whom we sent our inquiries are but a fraction of the total number, but they were selected from a large variety of schools and can safely be taken to be fairly representativ of all, and the percentage of replies would doubtless hav been substantially the same had we written to one thousand instead of to one hundred. Some, at least, of those to whom our inquiries were mailed, and who hav not answered, are Atheists or Agnostics, as we know. This fact, taken alone, is sufficient to show all thoughtful peopeople that the church yet exerts a tremendous influence and is capable of infinit mischief in spite of the declension from her standard of the flower of the literary and scientific world. When we hav a hundred papers, each having ten times the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and a thousand well-equipped lecturers in the field, a good many more of our teachers and politicians will know how they stand on the question of church taxation. And the way to increase the number and efficiency of Freethought papers and Freethought lecturers is to take hold still more enthusiastically and help those that we now hav.

Professor Fuertes, who is in favor of church taxation, agrees with President Hervey and Professors Whicher and Hewett, who are opposed to such taxation, that the exemption of such property does not amount to an appropriation from the state for the propagation of religion. President Strong does not regard "exemption from taxation to this extent as engaging the state in the teaching of religion" and Professor Whicher says that "it is a perverse logic which can see in this exemption from taxation an appropriation for the propagation of religious doctrins." On the other hand, Treasurer Montgomery frankly admits that "exemption from taxation certainly has the effect of an appropriation to encourage religious doctrins," and Treasurer Corkhill adds his cumulativ testimony that there will hav to be that much more from the state if church property is exempt. Here are four men all favoring the exemption of church property, two of whom declare that this exemption does not involve the teaching of religious dogmas by the state and the other two as positivly affirming that it does. The first two are men of the pulpit and study, quite possibly unfamiliar with practical affairs; the last two are men of business, who, as county treasurers, know that they deduct from the total assessment of the county the exempt properties and base the tax levy upon what is left. Hence it is with them a matter of actual, everyday knowledge that the exemption of church property from taxation does, in effect, as our question implied, amount to an appropriation from the state for the inculcation of religious notions. The officials see facts to which the teachers are blind; but what shall we say of men who, clearly perceiving that church exemption is state support of religion, yet defend that exemption? It is no trifling matter that men sworn to uphold the Constitution are ready and eager to violate its letter and its spirit in the interest of the church, and to do this with their eyes wide open to the truth that they are trampling under foot the organic law of the land.

We wish to call the attention of these gentlemen to the fact that we asked if exemption of church property from taxation was not, in effect, an appropriation by the state to the church. We did not imply that it was identical in form, which some of them are trying to disprove. Essentially it is an appropriation, a gift. No argument, no play upon words, can make it appear to be anything else. The most practical men among the pro-exemptionists hav been forced to concede this, and in terms strong, precise, and unequivocal. This much settled, there is but one position for men and women to take who are opposed to the union of church and state, who are loyal to the best traditions of the republic, and who are determined that the country shall not be ruled by a hierarchy that would fatten on the law-seized labor fruits of those who can not accept the creeds which the hierarchy exists to propagate and defend. The exemption of church wealth from taxation is favoritism, it is a wrong, it is the payment of the priest and the erection of the church with taxes wrung by the state from the dissenting citizen. It is theft.

Professor Oliver, while opposed to exemption so long as the "church" is an organization devoted to "the inculcation of certain religious dogmas," thinks that if the time comes when "exemption" includes all societies "whose primary aim is ethical, regardless of whether they hav or hav not an implied creed as to religion, then such exemption would no longer be unjust, although it might be unwise," etc. It is difficult to see how it could be otherwise than shortsighted, unjust, and dangerous. So long as the state is supported by compulsory taxation all exemption of private property must, in the nature of things, be bad in principle and pernicious in effect. It is outrageous special privilege. It is discrimination against one class of tax-payers for the advantage of another class who should be tax-payers. Until we hav unanimity in ethics, which is scarcely more possible than unanimity in religion, we hav no business to grant special favors to those professors of ethics who organize themselvs into societies. Not all people who lead fairly good lives forgather into organizations for the teaching of ethical principles, and there is no basis in equity for laying additional burdens upon the outsiders for the benefit of those within. Such unequal taxation would be fundamentally immoral, notwithstanding the claim that it was imposed for promotion of ethics.

President Hervey fearlessly asserts that churches are not private property. If they are not private property they must be public property. The students of the St. Lawrence University will hav some fine exercises in casuistry when their president asks them to define the differences between these two kinds of property, and tries to get them to state clearly and logically the points of dissimilarity which make churches public property and railroads private property. Public school buildings, courthouses, jails, arsenals, war-ships, etc., are public property. Farms, shops, warehouses, churches, railroads, steamships, etc., are private property. It may fairly be assumed that President Hervey holds that churches are not private property because they are owned, generally, by a large number of individuals acting collectivly. If this constitutes them public property and so exempts them from taxation, then, reasoning similarly, railroads, coal mines, steamship lines, political clubs, yacht clubs, and many other properties are also public property and should pay no taxes. There is no other possible pretense upon which churches can be taken out of the category of private possessions. President Hervey should know that public property is the property of all the people of the city, or the state, or the nation, as the case may be, and all the people hav equal right to a voice in its management. If churches are public property, then those churches should be under the control of boards of managers selected by the entire electorate or appointed by an administrativ officer elected by that electorate. This means a state church of course. Is President Hervey prepared to accept the logic of his position?

President Strong observes that, in his judgment, church property should be exempt, because, "like hospitals and schools, it helps the state." But does it help the state? The question is an open one, and so long as it is unsettled it is indubitably wrong to compel those who take the negativ side to pay for what they deem a positiv evil, or, at the best, of no value. Such compulsory tribute cannot be justified in any country which respects private judgment in matters of religious belief—that is, in any country which holds to the theory of separation of church and state. But even if we admit that the church helps the state, nothing is gained for the principle of exemption. Every legitimate industry, every man who labors with his hands or evolves good thoughts in his brain, helps the state. Should all industries, should all workers and thinkers, therefore, be exempt from taxation? Note where this ridiculous theory leads. All states are at present supported by compulsory taxation. Churches, we are told, should not be taxed, because they "help the state." Hence all property and all men who "help the state," should be put on the free list. All property put to productiv and moral uses and all men and women who control and direct it, "help the state." Who, then, will be left to pay the expenses of the state? Manifestly only the vicious and criminal. It would appear, therefore, would it not, that the continued existence of the state depends upon the propagation of large masses of depraved people? They are the foundations upon which, according to President Strong's idea, rests the superstructure of the state.

President Strong avers also that the church is not a money-making institution, and, consequently, should not be taxed. But this is not a fact. The church is a congeries of associations which is able to keep employed and pay salaries to an army of one hundred and twelve thousand resident clergymen and large numbers of missionaries, organists, and other employees. Various business devices are resorted to raise money. Because the church is largely supported by voluntary contributions is no reason why the aggregate of those contributions should escape taxation. If Smith receives legacies of five hundred dollars each from his father and his uncle, will the one thousand dollars be exempted from taxation on the ground that it is made up of gifts?

These objections to equality in taxation put forward by President Strong hav been exhaustivly answered in our pamphlet, "Church Property," and to that we refer the reader who desires a fuller elucidation of the problem than we hav room for here.

President Strong makes this curious assertion: "I do not regard exemption from taxation to this extent as engaging the state in the least in the teaching of religion, but only as recognizing the good which comes from the church as a moral and patriotic influence." The teaching of religion necesitates the expenditure of more or less money. When the state exempts church property from taxation it leaves in the treasuries of the churches certain sums of money. The churches are engaged in the work of religious instruction. They expend in this work the money which the state has declined to take from them in the form of taxes. This refusal to take taxes from the churches is the way the state has of "recognizing" the churches. Who will presume to assert that this recognition is not equivalent to the voting of an appropriation for the purpose of teaching religion, which is the mission of the church?

No one will question Professor Whicher's statement that "various kinds of property are left untaxed at present." That is not in dispute. The actual issue is whether church wealth should be included in this exempt property. We hav already answered the "public good" argument, but will add here that while no one contends that blacksmith shops do not, "on the whole," promote the "public good," we hav heard no plea that because of this service they should be exempt from taxation. The conceivable circumstances that Professor Whicher thinks might justify the repeal of the exemption laws are "attempts to evade taxation, under shelter of church corporations," and the accumulation of "an undue proportion of the wealth of a community in the hands of ecclesiastical organizations." Neither state of things exists among us, he says. Any proportion of untaxed wealth is an undue proportion, and there is no doubt that much secular property is hidden under the mantle of ecclesiastical wealth. A careful perusal of "Church Property" would greatly enlighten Professor Whicher.

A public library—using the word public in its proper sense—is not taxed because it belongs to the people as a whole, like a public school house, a jail, or an armory, and if it receives all classes of books it is not open to the charge of partialism. All other libraries should be taxed. "If some denominations were taxed and others exempt," says Professor Whicher, "there would be a just cause of complaint." This is precisely what is done and it is one of the offenses of which we complain. So-called religious denominations are exempt, while persons belonging to non-religious and anti-religious societies, with those not members of any organizations, are forced to pay their taxes for them. That is, the non- and anti-religious people are mulct to make up appropriations for the religious bodies. How can any man of education and ordinary sense fail to see this? Besides, it discriminates in that it divides its favors unequally among different religious denominations. It givs to them in the direct ratio of their wealth instead of their needs. If the Episcopalians build a million-dollar cathedral and the Salvation Army a five-hundred-dollar barracks, the state, by exempting both from taxation, givs to the Episcopalians annually—supposing the tax levy to be two per cent—$20,000 and to the Salvation Army $10 That is, those best able to help themselvs get the most from the state and those who hav the hardest struggle to maintain their corporate existence receive the least. And yet Professor Whicher says the state is "quite impartial"!

Professor Whicher is very unfortunate in his concluding comparison. Because the Constitution is not made "godless" by its strict neutrality in all matters of religion the state does not propagate religious doctrins when it throws neutrality to the winds and activly assists the churches in inculcating beliefs which are not accepted by a part of the people whom the state compels to help pay for that teaching. So the gentleman argues. No doubt Professor Whicher is at home in Latin and Greek, but his logic is hopelessly decrepit. Such an attempt to transmute antitheses into parallels would be highly amusing were the question not so serious in its economic and ethical aspects.

Several of Professor Hewett's objections to justice in taxation hav been answered in commenting upon the communications of other contributors to the symposium, but his claim that a church in a community increases the value of other property calls for a few words. As a matter of fact a church is not always considered an advantage to a neighborhood. There are various reasons for this, but we hav not space to enumerate them here. They hav been dwelt upon at length in "Church Property." Suffice it to say that the fact is as stated. In one residence district in this city it is stipulated in all papers transferring real estate that no livery stable or church shall be erected upon the property specified. As to the less taxes assessed against non-productiv real estate it is needful to say that our system of taxation will easily bear remodeling in many ways and another wrong does not render innocuous that of church exemption.

But if it were granted that the church invariably augments other property values this admission would not commit us to the acceptance of the proposition that therefore churches should be exempt from taxation. The building of a railroad in a section hitherto without one will undoubtedly increase the selling value of all other property, except stage coaches, but that fact would not generally be deemed sufficient to warrant the exemption of the railroad from taxation. Fine residences and substantial business blocks also increase the value of adjacent property, but does Professor Hewett reason from this fact that the beautiful houses and imposing stores and office buildings should be relieved from the burdens of taxation?

We are utterly unable to see that "the appropriation of state funds for the support of asylums, hospitals," etc., under church control is any more promotiv of "sectarian interest primarily" than is the exemption of church property from taxation.

There is no essential difference in the principles involved in the two cases and the results are the same—religious beliefs are propagated at the expense of the non-religious, the anti-religious and the indifferent.

Professor Gaines seems inclined to think that what he correctly surmises is our attitude toward untaxed church property is attributable to our hostility to religion, and, being a Christian, he deems himself under an obligation to defend the church from the attack of the unbelievers. We presume that Professor Gaines will not call in question the Christian orthodoxy of the Independent and the Northwestern Christian Advocate, hence we submit to his candid consideration this excerpt from a recent issue of the former paper:

"The following is an honest statement of simple justice, and we are glad to see it in the Northwestern Christian Advocate:

"'In the wiser day coming, every dollar of church personal value and every foot of church land will pay taxes to support honest secular government. Remission of taxes for church and church school uses is a secular gift to churches.'"

In "Church Property" Professor Gaines will find similar testimonies to the need for and value of common honesty in taxation, taken from the columns of other religious papers and from the writings of distinguished statesmen as well. We earnestly recommend him to read that pamphlet carefully. The Professor's attempt to show that an analogy exists between the failure to levy an income tax and the exemption of church property from taxation is not particularly happy. We are demanding equality in taxation, not the imposition of a special burden upon men of certain incomes. Churches pay no taxes; it is proposed that they shall be put on an equal footing with other classes of property. Their exemption amounts to an appropriation for their support. The removal of the exemption would stop the appropriation. That is the whole question. If churches were already taxed equally with other kinds of property the demand for an additional tax on them alone would parallel the demand for an income tax. Professor Gaines, as a man of finance and business, should not hav permitted himself to make such a blunder.

The other points raised by Professor Gaines hav been disposed of in our earlier comments, as hav those sought to be made by the county treasurers who agree with him that church property is privileged wealth. The Constitutional Convention may fail to do its duty in the premises, but such remissness will only postpone the coming of the day of justice; it cannot weaken the arguments here advanced nor prevent the final victory of the right.

Wanted—More Subscribers.

We solicit the kind attention of our friends to the need which exists of increasing the subscription list of THE TRUTH SEEKER. There are several reasons for this, which our readers will readily see. First, It will do a world of good, by making more Liberals and by interesting those already liberal in the work of Freethought. The church is making great encroachments upon our liberties, and the people need to know about it, in order to defeat its tyranny. And those who read THE TRUTH SEEKER are a hundred times more interested and activ than those who do not. Second, It is a duty we owe to our fellow-men to giv them the light of reason we hav obtained. Liberalism makes for true civilization, and freedom from fear of an angry God makes men happier and better. Every Liberal should do all he can to lift up his neighbors from the darkness of superstition to the glorious plain of mental liberty. And, as Mr. Wakeman says, referring to the resolution regarding the Liberal papers passed at the late International Congress: "They are the very life of the cause of intellectual and practical emancipation of the people. As such they are to be built up and sustained by constant care, payment, encouragement, and solicitation for subscribers for them." Third, An increase in the list will relieve the readers from the occasional "duns" we are compelled to send out in order to get money with which to pay bills. If we can obtain two or three thousand new subscribers, the increased revenue will make the business work of the paper easier, and we can continue to improve the paper without fear of financial embarrassments.

To reward those who will do a little for us in this matter we hav arranged to take a large number of Mr. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," and to every one who sends us four new yearly subscribers at the regular rates of $3 ($12 in all), we shall send a copy of that magnificent work free. Those who send the club before the book is off the press will be enrolled among the original subscribers and patrons in the book.

And to make it easy to get these four new subscribers we will offer them as a premium either of two splendid works—The "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated," or W. S. Bell's "Handbook of Freethought" in cloth binding Our readers know the value of these books, and that about every Liberal in the country would like a copy of one of the other. Either one of these, as may be chosen, will be given to the new subscribers obtained in these clubs of four, and a copy of "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" to the one who gets up the club and sends the money and names.

We cannot afford to make this premium to single subscribers, but to enable old subscribers and single new subscribers to obtain these and other desirable works at a great reduction, we hav made a list of premiums in connection with subscriptions to the paper, to be found in the first column of the first editorial page of THE TRUTH SEEKER. We are willing to do our part toward making the obtaining of good Liberal works easy and cheap, and hope our readers will take advantage of the terms offered.

Once more we ask that a favorable eye be turned in our direction, and a helpful hand extended. As the resolutions of the International Congress expressed it, Boom the Liberal papers and you boom the Liberal cause.

A twelve-page protest against the Sunday bills offered in Congress by Kyle, Johnson, Gallinger, and Morse will be sent for five cents Twenty five copies, three cents each; one hundred copies, $2.

Push the circulation of the "Church Property" pamphlet. Only fifteen cents for a brochure of one hundred pages. Ten copies for $1; fifty copies, $4.50; one hundred copies, $8; postage always prepaid.

The debate arranged to take place at Pierson, Iowa, between the Rev. Mr. Dungan of the Disciple church and W. F. Jamieson has been declared off by the Christian committee. The reason given by the committee for the backdown is very obscure, and, as printed in a local paper, is not at all understandable. But as a "fortuitous concourse" of words it serves its predestined purpose as an excuse.

"The Parkhurst society will petition Governor Flower to pardon young James Noonan, who was sentenced in 1891 to six and a half years in Sing Sing prison for stealing $1.50. The real thief has since confessed."—Daily Paper.

What kind of a system of justice hav we which necessitates that the pardoning power be approached by petitioners on bended knees before an innocent person can be "pardoned"?

The Freethought Letter-writing Corps will this week write to the Advertiser, Geneva, New York, upon the subject of church taxation. Edgar Parker, its editor, says that churches are built by free contributions from their members; they are not money-making institutions; their doors are open to all; their teachings are "morality, sobriety, honesty, and integrity." "The public schools are not taxed, nor the court houses and asylums; even the jails and prisons, wherein are confined those who do not go to church, who break the laws, are not taxed," etc. He says that the movement for church taxation is headed and directed by the Infidels. Show him that these people can giv sound, cogent reasons for their attitude, and can do it courteously. Call his attention to the difference between the public buildings, etc., which he names, and public property such as churches, bookstores, hotels, and manufactories. Nothing would be gained by taxing public property, because, as such property is the result of taxation, taxing it would simply be going to the trouble of taking money out of one pocket to put into the other. His attention might also be called to the fact that church members and attendants do more than their share in filling the jails and prisons.

THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 7th will be a special number, containing a symposium on the pending Sunday bills, in which Representativs and Senators will participate, assisted by the Editor. The Sunday question is one of the momentous issues of the time and if reactionary Christianity triumphs here the most hopeful of us will hav just cause for apprehension bordering on despair. But we do not intend to be beaten and borne down by the Covenanter hordes. Sunday must be the people's day, not the priests'. THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 7th will cost seven cents per copy; five copies or more, five cents each. Order in advance.

When a preacher comes in contact with a scientific fact or hypothesis he almost invariably shows that he knows nothing about science. Rev. J. A. McIlwain, of Detroit, is an illustration of this fact. Preaching recently about the "survival of the fittest" he declared emphatically that in nature and especially among men there is no such thing. "The most highly organized children hav no even chance of life when placed alongside the coarsely organized and the base," etc. One question: Which theory does the survival of Dr. McIlwain go to prove, the scientific or his own? As a matter of truth, pleasantry aside, the reverend gentleman does not understand that which he attacks. No thoroughly well-informed scientist claims that the "survival of the fittest" means necessarily the survival of the morally fit. Those individuals, families, tribes, nations, survive which are fittest to survive, that is, those liv which can most readily adapt themselvs to or modify their environments, or both. This is what the principle implies, and this is the truth. It is to be supposed that Mr. McIlwain is so saturated with the Theistic notion of a "moral governor" of the universe that it has blinded his eyes to the glaring fact that nature is non-moral.

The American Citizen, an American Protectiv Association paper of Boston, has a very significant cartoon on its first page in its issue of June 2d. A liberal Protestant minister sits in an easy chair and gazes with a trancèd look upon a legend on the wall above his book- and flower-laden table. The legend reads: "$5,000 a year; long vacation." He says: "I don't see any danger." Behind him, floating in from across the ocean, come frightful-looking monsters labeled "Ignorance," "Pauperism," "Crime," "Priestcraft," "Anarchy." By the preacher's chair are scattered volumes by Plato, Buddha, Renan, Hume, and the German philosophers. Evidently these hav helped blind him. At his feet, near neighbor to the thought-inspiring books, is coiled the snake of "Infidelity," with reared head and clown's face. This cartoon reveals, as by a flash of light from the hell of orthodoxy, the hatred of the "American" orders for rationalism and Freethought. On another page of the same issue of the same paper we find this choice stanza, quoted as the motto of the Loyal Orange League, a society closely affiliated in purpose with the American Protectiv Association:

"We will support the Bible,
God's holy book of truth,
And keep it in our public schools,
For the guide of early youth."

Poor dog Tray was known by the company he kept. We judge that very few Liberals will be found in the company of these Protestant zealots.

TAXATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY

Arguments for and Against the Secular Proposition.

WHAT SOME EDUCATORS THINK.

Views of Politicians—Time-Honored But Exploded Assertions in Defense of Favoritism in Taxation.

The Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER recently sent to one hundred of the leading educators of the state of New York, including the presidents and professors in colleges and universities, the letter of inquiry of which a copy is given below. The same letter was sent also to the county treasurers of the sixty counties in the state. This is the letter:

28 LAFAYETTE PLACE, NEW YORK.

DEAR SIR: Will you kindly answer, for publication, the questions given below?

1. Should church property be subject to taxation, and on the same conditions and at the same rate as other private property?

2. Does or does not the exemption of church property from taxation amount, in effect, to an appropriation from the state to the church for the propagation of religious doctrins?

Hoping that you will favor me with an early reply, I remain, Respectfully yours,

E. M. MACDONALD,
Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

THE ANSWERS.

FROM THE MEN OF LEARNING.

YES TO BOTH QUESTIONS.

From Alexander J. C. Skene, President, Professor of the Medical and Surgical Diseases of Women, Long Island College-Hospital, Brooklyn.

1. Yes.
2. It does. A. J. C. SKENE.

From Herman L. Fairchild, B.S., Professor of Geology and Natural History, and Curator of the Geological Museum, University of Rochester. Lately President of the Rochester Methodist Episcopal Union.

1. Yes.
2. Yes.

The Protestants are inconsistent in accepting such help. H. L FAIRCHILD.

From George C. Caldwell, B.S., Ph.D., Professor of General Chemistry and of Agricultural Chemistry, Cornell University.

DEAR SIR: I believe that church property should be taxed, on same conditions and at same rate as other property.

I think that any other course does amount to an appropriation from the state to the church.

Yours truly, G C. CALDWELL.

From Lavergne F. Gardner, Expert Accountant, Lecturer on Political Economy, Commercial History, Commercial Geography and Business Customs, Eastman Business College, Poughkeepsie.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I am pleased to respond to your invitation to make answer to the questions, Should church property be taxed? etc. We may fairly estimate that from one and one-half millions to two millions valuation of church property in this city (Poughkeepsie) of about 23,000 population is to-day exempt from taxation. Every tax payer in the city is helping to support and increase this property. We hav some sixteen or seventeen churches and annexes struggling for existence, and the moral and benevolent activities in most of these organizations, the enthusiasm of their youth, the sense of duty of the older members, are spent in maintaining these institutions. For these the ladies sew, contrive, beg, cook, hold fairs, giv entertainments, get up picnics, festivals, concerts, yea, move heaven and earth that these seventeen organizations may liv. Tax church property and the same number of people will meet in half the number of churches, feel the inspiration that a closer fellowship always givs, pay their taxes, and expend surplus vitality in doing good instead of accumulating property. A large part of what is called religion to-day may be fairly classed under the head of luxury, and who among us will deny that luxuries are fair objects for taxation? What is the practical effect of this exemption and protection? Church property in our large cities aggregates hundreds of millions of dollars in valuation. The most valuable are exclusiv, and in general utility and character are religious club houses. This is comparativly a young nation, and strong, yet it is wise to read to this generation a page from history. At the beginning of the French Revolution two acres out of every five in all France belonged to the church, and the church was so good a judge of land that in most places the two acres belonging to the church were worth more than the people's three. Look abroad to day, at Italy, Spain, Mexico, Peru. In most Catholic countries that edifice or group of buildings that overwhelms the mind with its grandeur, either for its magnitude or its magnificence, you may be sure is ecclesiastical; and in these same countries man, potentially divine, grovels in the dirt, wearing the blank look of ignorance or idiocy, in order that the God whom he adores may dwell in lofty temples and glisten with beautiful gems. 'Tis a sorry sight. The established church in England, with its many fat livings, robs the producer, who pays the tax but is never represented therein.

My taxes this year amounted to $71 40. If church property in Poughkeepsie had been taxed I would hav paid about $65. I am compelled to contribute between six and seven dollars each year to support churches not of my choice nor patronage. If I should attend church twice every Sunday of the year and drop a nickel on the plate each time, I would not pay as much as I am now paying.

According to the census of 1890, church property in this country was valued at $679,000,000. Statisticians tell us that this class of property doubles in value every ten or twelve years. These exempt millions laugh at the tax collector, while the widow and the fatherless must pay or go under the sheriff's hammer.

Exemption of church property from taxation, and reduction to the clergy because they are a part of said property, is a positiv injury to citizen and society to-day. Cut off this remnant of the middle ages. Make it possible for a man in the church to be just and honest, and clean and upright as the man outside. Tax all church property. Ask every priest or clergyman to pay full fare, and standard price for clothing, food, and fuel. The exemption of church property from taxation is equivalent to an appropriation by the state for the support of all churches, hence the propagation of religious doctrins. Fraternally, L. F. GARDNER.

YES, TO FIRST QUESTION; NO, TO SECOND.

From Estevan A. Fuertes, M.A.S.C.E, Director of the College of Civil Engineering, and Professor of Civil Engineering, Cornell University.

1. Yes, and at such rates as would truthfully prove neither persecution nor favoritism.

2 No; it is not identical with an appropriation. It has some equivalent features, but exemption is certainly favoritism, likely to be abused, as it is really abused. Such exemption might, I think, be proved unconstitutional. E. A. FUERTES.

YES, UNDER ACCEPTED DEFINITION OF "CHURCH."

From James E. Oliver, A.M., Professor of Mathematics, Cornell University.

SIR: To exempt church property from whatever taxation is imposed on other private property is to giv the churches indirect state aid, and this appears to me dangerous in principle. Moreover, such state aid is UNJUST as long as it rests in any degree upon our practically defining a "church" as an institution one of whose objects shall be the inculcation of certain religious doctrins—for instance, of Theism. If ever, for purposes of tax-exemption, the word "church" should come to include all organizations whose primary aim is ethical, regardless of whether they hav or hav not an implied creed as to religion or of what that implied creed may be, then I think that tax-emption would no longer be unjust, although it might be unwise in two ways—as keeping open an opportunity for abuses, and as depriving the churches of that great power for good which comes from healthy and recognized self-dependence. JAMES EDWARD OLIVER.

NOT PREPARED TO ANSWER.

From Andrew V. V. Raymond, D.D., President-elect of Union College.

DEAR SIR: I am not able to answer your inquiries as to the taxation of church property, as I hav not yet given the subject sufficient thought to formulate an intelligent opinion. Respectfully yours,

ANDREW V. V. RAYMOND.

From Frank Abbott, M.D., Dean of the Faculty, Professor of Dental Histology, Surgery and Therapeutics, University of the State of New York.

MY DEAR SIR: I regret to say that I am not prepared to answer the questions propounded in reference to the taxation of church property, in a manner to interest the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

With many thanks for your kind invitation,

I am yours truly, FRANK ABBOTT.

NO TO BOTH QUESTIONS.

From Alpheus B. Hervey, Ph.D., President St. Lawrence University.

1. It is not private property. It should not be taxed any more than any other property held and used for charitable or educational purposes.

2. Indirectly, perhaps, but not in a way or to an extent that is objectionable when all are treated alike. ALPHEUS B. HERVEY.

From Rev. A. H. Strong, D.D., President Rochester Theological Seminary.

DEAR SIR: In my judgment church property should not be subject to taxation, for the reason that, like hospitals and schools, it helps the state, while it has no profits which it could share with the state. The income is all outgo. Of course I should mean by church property not real estate or bonds held for purposes of endowment, but only actual houses of worship. I do not regard exemption from taxation to this extent as engaging the state in the least in the teaching of religion, but only as recognizing the good which comes from the church as a moral and patriotic influence.

Yours truly, AUGUSTUS H. STRONG.

From George M. Whicher, A.M., Professor of Latin and Greek, Packer Collegiate Institute, Brooklyn.

DEAR SIR: 1. In taxing private property the state is not, and should not be, logically consistent. Whether church property or other private property is to be taxed, and how heavily taxed, are questions to be settled by considerations of policy and not at all by a priori principles. As a matter of fact, various kinds of property are left untaxed at present. If the public good is on the whole promoted by the existence of churches (as it certainly is), then the state is wise in not insisting upon its prerogativ in respect to them. The only circumstances conceivable which might justify a change in the present policy are, first, an attempt to evade taxation under shelter of church corporations; and, second, the accumulation of an undue proportion of the wealth of a community in the hands of ecclsiastical organizations. As I am not aware that either state of things exists among us, I should answer your first question in the negativ.

2. It is a perverse logic which can see in this exemption from taxation an appropriation for the propagation of religious doctrins. It would be as fair to say that because a public library is left untaxed the state is giving money to disseminate the views of certain authors. If some denominations were taxed and others exempt, there would be a just cause of complaint. But the state is quite impartial. I do not think it "propagates" any religious doctrins, any more than it is a godless institution (as some of our friends maintain) because there is no creed in our national and state constitutions.

Very truly yours, GEORGE MEASON WHICHER.

From Waterman T. Hewett, A.B., Ph D., Professor of the German Language and Literature, Cornell University.

GENTLEMEN: In answer to your inquiry whether church property should be subject to taxation, and on the same conditions, and at the same rate as other property, I would say that I hav always held that it should be free from taxation. I hav regarded religion as the basis of moral and social order, and, therefore, the church as promoting good citizenship as no other agency. As churches are erected not with a view to financial profit, and are conducted in the public interest, I regard them upon the same basis as literary institutions. The existence of a church in a community increases the value of all other property; and residence in a community where no church exists would appeal to but a limited class. Therefore, as churches add to the value of all property, and are not erected with a view to pecuniary returns which they seldom make, I hav always held that they should be free from taxation. I do not regard them as private property, as they are open to the public and accessible to all. While they are immediately for the benefit of the organization which establishes them, their influence is more widely felt as a source of charity and beneficence in a community. If property is held by a church and not used immediately for educational or religious purposes, it should be taxed like other property.

In answer to your second question, I should say no. The state does not collect taxes on non-productiv real estate. If the churches did not exist, the value of all other property would be less, and the amount of the required taxes would hav to be greater on the taxable values of all property.

The appropiation of state funds for the support of asylums, hospitals, and other charitable institutions not open to all citizens, and with the purpose of promoting sectarian interest primarily, I am opposed to.

W. T. HEWETT.

From Clement C. Gaines, A. B, B. L., M. Accts., President, Treasurer, and General Superintendent Eastman National Business College, Poughkeepsie.

DEAR SIR: I hav your inquiry of the 24th, and beg to say that I hav hardly time or space in the compass of this letter to answer as fully as I would like to do the questions you propound.

Suffice it to say that it depends upon what you mean by church property whether or not taxes should be levied in this direction. I hav no question as to the propriety of keeping the land on which a church stands and the building free from taxation. If a church should own other property than this it should bear the same rate as that appropriated to private uses.

I am not sufficiently familiar with your paper to know what your attitude is on this subject, but judge from your asking the question that you believe in taxing churches for any property occupied or owned by them. Possibly you are not particularly friendly to religious organizations. I must say that my attitude is the opposit; that I believe all Christian churches to be eminently institutions in the interest of the general public. I say Christian churches because this is a Christian country, and because one of the highest ambitions of my life is to be able to realize a true following of Christ.

I do not wish to hav the state as the state render me or any other advocate of the work of Christ any assistance in this particular matter, but as it leaves other institutions of a public character intended for the elevation of all people untaxed, notably educational institutions, I think it not improper that churches should hav the same exemption.

Now as to your second question I can only say that I do not think such exemption in effect an appropriation from the state to the church for the propagation of religious doctrins. It is simply in my opinion a recognition of the generally beneficial character of the work done in the churches. One might equally as well say that a failure to levy an income tax would amount in effect to an appropriation from the state to people of considerable incomes for the increase of their revenues.

I hav not time to go into this subject further, but I hav never thought otherwise than I write here. Still I am not so wedded to my views that I might not be persuaded that I may be mistaken. My friendship, however, is, as I hav said before, unalterably on the side of the church, and I hav but little patience with those who preach against it.

Very truly yours, C C. GAINES.

FROM THE COUNTY TREASURERS.

PUTNAM COUNTY.

My answer to both questions is, Yes.

Respectfully yours, HELLYER RYDER.

ESSEX COUNTY

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 25th at hand, and in reply would say I do not think church property ought to be taxed for any purpose whatever.

Yours respectfully, F. E. HUESTIE.

SENECA COUNTY.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of the 25th—No. 1. I do not believe in taxing church property. No. 2 Yes. There will hav to be so much more from the state, but I think that the state can provide for that without taxing church property.

Yours truly, M. T. CORKHILL.

SCHUYLER COUNTY.

Believe that the exemption of church property from taxation according to existing laws is just and right.

Exemption from taxation certainly has the effect of an appropriation to encourage religious doctrins.

Very respectfully, G G. MONTGOMERY.

OTSEGO COUNTY.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 25th inst. to hand.

I am against taxing church property in any way. As for the exemption of church property from taxation, I fail to see why or how it would be called an appropriation from the state to the church for the propagation of religious doctrins.

Yours truly, SAM'L D. EDICK.

CLINTON COUNTY.

DEAR SIR: Replying to yours of the 25th inst. As to your first question. Inasmuch as all church societies are organized and maintained for the moral as well as the religious benefits of the communities, I believe that the church property should be exempt from taxation. Other property owned, however, by church societies, not used for church purposes, should, in my judgment, pay taxes the same as all other property. In reply to your second question, would say that while the exemption from taxation does in effect amount to an appropriation from the state to the extent of the state tax which such church property would otherwise pay, yet, as the expense of maintaining the churches is paid by comparativly few for the benefit of the many, the exemption from taxation is in my judgment fully justified. Very respectfully yours,

ANDREW WILLIAMS.

Freethought and Secular Notes from England.

"THE SCENE IS CHANGED."

Recently in my "Notes" I spoke of the very beautiful weather we had been having in England during the month of April; but I also expressed my opinion that King Frost would make a raid upon us at any moment. He has done so, and has thus marred the atmospheric splendors that lent a luster to nature at the dawn of spring. May in England has been exceptionally bleak, and with rain, hail, and snow, we are driven back to the gloom and discomfort of an English winter. During the present week at Greenwich the thermometer in the shade fell to the freezing point, and on the grass exposed to the sky the reading was 26 deg. At Loughborough, in Leicestershire, the thermometer in the shade fell to 28 deg., and on the grass to 24 deg., or eight degrees of frost, and at York and Cambridge the reading in the screen was 29 deg. At Liverpool the atmosphere was chill and wintry to a remarkable degree. In Scotland the weather has been extremely cold, and heavy snow showers hav been frequent. In the neighborhood of Dundee seven degrees of frost hav been registered. In Central Perthshire the hills for days were coated with snow. So, after reading this account of change of scene and temperature with my former description of "The Dawn of Spring," the readers of this journal will readily understand the fickleness of the English climate.

THE SECULAR CONFERENCE.

On Whit Sunday the National Secular Society held its annual conference, which was of a thoroughly practical and representativ character. This year we met at Liverpool, and although I hav attended many Secular Conferences in England, not one has appeared to me to hav been more successful than this of 1894. The executiv were able to present a record of a good year's work, and to indicate an interesting and useful program of action for the immediate future. The increase of membership to the National Secular Society during the past year has been most satisfactory, and my American and Canadian readers may rest assured that Secularism in England was never more flourishing than it is at the present time. The demand for lectures is greater, in some instances, than the supply. Arrangements are being made for an extensiv propaganda of open-air lectures both in London and in the provinces. This is very useful work, but it is exceedingly trying for the lecturers, who hav not only frequently to answer abusiv opponents, but our speakers hav to contend against religious rowdyism that is a disgrace to Christian advocacy. I am glad to be able to report that the circulation of the Freethinker still advances, and the sale of general Freethought literature is better than ever. A new Freethought journal has just been started in Bradford, Yorkshire, with the well-known title of the Truth Seeker. It is conducted by earnest Secularists, and judging from its first issue it deserves to hav a long and prosperous life.

THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD.

"The Religious Question" has once more occupied the main portion of a sitting of the London school board. Already hundreds of hours hav been consumed by the board in acrimonious controversy on this subject which has been audaciously raised by the Dogmatist party without any mandate from without. As it has been for the last twelve months so it inevitably will continue until the bigots are removed from the board. I hav no doubt that this desirable result will be achieved at the coming school board elections in November. I shall shortly enter upon the fight to secure a seat for myself and should I be successful my first business will be to see if the Bible cannot be excluded altogether from the education in the schools.

SECULAR ACTIVITY IN SCOTLAND.

I hav just concluded nearly a month's tour in Scotland, where I hav been lecturing and debating. All my audiences hav been large and most orderly. Scotland is waking up and taking great interest in public debates upon theological matters. The people listen now with profoun attention, without the slightest manifestation of hostil feeling. This is a marked indication of the progress of Freethought and shows that the labors of secular workers hav not been in vain. In my recent encounters I hav discussed the subjects of "The Existence of God," "Has Man a Soul?" "The Bible and Modern Progress," "Christ the Ideal for Man." My opponents, Dr. Jamieson, of Glasgow, and the Rev. David Macrae, of Dundee, were exceedingly courteous, but they lacked debating force. Still we must be thankful for small mercies in these days when it is so difficult to induce prominent theologians to even attempt to defend their faith in public debate.

MR G. W. FOOTE.

Mr. Foote, the president of the National Secular Society, has been compelled to take a rest from his heavy labors. His sickness has not been dangerous, but it might hav become so had he not heeded the warning of his medical attendant. Mr. Foote is an energetic toiler in the Secular movement and what he undertakes to do he does thoroughly, as his exposure of the "Converted Shoemaker" myth amply testified. It is now ten years since my colleague suffered twelve months' imprisonment for "conscience' sake" and a few of his friends hav decided to present him with a "testimonial" in commemoration of the tenth anniversary of his release from jail. An appeal for funds for this purpose is now being made and I hope in my next "Notes" to be able to announce that the response to the appeal has been worthy of the object for which it is made.

NO PRAYERS.

The Essex board of guardians hav very wisely refused to imitate the folly of the House of Commons in opening their proceedings with prayer. At a recent sitting it was proposed that the chairman should open future meetings with prayer, asking God's blessing upon the work which many of the guardians would probably soon hav to undertake in connection with the establishment of parish councils. Rev. E. P. Gibson seconded, remarking that in these days of Agnoticism it would be well to follow the custom of the House of Commons and the London school board. It was suggested that as the board would cease to exist next November the proposal was something like a death-bed repentance, in which the speaker did not believe. Mr. G. Hammond said that, although activly engaged in various branches of Christian work, he should oppose the motion, because he thought it would be hypocrisy to hav prayers. When he read some of the proceedings in the House of Commons he could not help thinking that there was a good deal of hypocrisy in the prayers which opened those proceedings. The proposer and seconder alone voted for the motion.

CHRISTIAN BIGOTRY.

The newspapers here hav just reported another instance of religious bigotry. A Mr. Wingrove, who says he is a churchman, recently lost by death his infant child, seven months old. He at once called upon the vicar of his parish with a view to its interment. In the course of conversation it transpired that the child had not been baptized. The vicar said he could not allow the body of an unbaptized person in the church, but that he would under the circumstances read a prayer at the graveside. The time arranged for this was six o'clock in the evening, and at that time, according to the arrangement of the vicar and the father, the parents, with the remains of their child, arrived at the parish churchyard, when a message was given to the father from the vicar that he did not consider it to be his duty to bury the child, the result being that the sorrowing mother had to be left in the open churchyard with the body while the father went to find some other minister to bury it. And yet we are told that Christianity has a humanizing effect upon its believers. In this case humanity was insulted and justice ignored. With such specimens of bigots as this vicar the church abounds.

RELIGIOUS HYPOCRISY.

The Weekly Dispatch, published in London, has just reported a case which shows the humbug that is mixed up with the English church. The parish church of St. Ives in Huntingdon has just been used for the dual purpose of teaching theology and posting the youngsters of the town in the art of gambling with dice for Bibles, which were presented at the close of the competition to the six boys who threw the highest numbers. The altar-table was the immediate scene of the gambling. No police were in attendance. On the same day, fifty policeman made a raid on "Uncle Tom's Cabin" and another public house in Bolton, arresting forty men and seizing their sporting paraphernalia. In court the defending solicitor said it was a hardship that these men should be prosecuted when noblemen and others went scot-free. The two publicans were fined £25 each and costs, and the remainder were mulcted in costs. There may be a distinction between throwing dice in church for Bibles and throwing dice in saloons for beer, but non-gamblers will fail to see much difference.

THE CHURCH ALARMED.

The parish councils bill now having become law the clergy are very anxious to wipe out the effect of the action of their bishops in the House of Lords. The clergy find themselvs confronted with the poorer classes who regard them as enemies to social progress. Hence they hav appealed to the archbishop of Canterbury to blow his sacred trumpet in favor of making the church an ally of social development. The holy man has promised to see what can be done to remove the bad impression created, but very little is expected from his guarded and indefinit reply to the clergy. The truth is, it is impossible to bring the church in touch with the reforms on this side of the Atlantic. Mental freedom and intellectual subjection are not congenial allies. Stagnation and progress cannot co-exist. The one is the symbol of the theological past and the other is the emblem of the Secular present.

A FREE SUNDAY.

This movement is deserving of special mention, inasmuch as there are societies organized to arrest its progress. Despite this, however, freedom is gaining notable triumphs. The first opening of the London Guildhall collection of paintings on Sundays was attended by over three thousand visitors, and many were unable to obtain admission. Even Eton College has opened its fine museum to students on Sunday afternoons. In Coventry the town council has given permission for the band to play on Sundays, and it is left with the players to select either sacred or secular music. Verily we move in spite of the church.

DISESTABLISHMENT OF CHURCHES.

Freethinkers are opposed to any church being supported or protected by the state. And the clergy are just now seriously concerned at the prospect before them as to the future position of their church. The present English Liberal government has intimated its intention of dissolving partnership with the churches in Scotland and in Wales. Hence the bishops, clergy, and laymen in convocation assembled during May passed resolutions condemning in no measured language what they term "the horrible iniquity" contemplated. Professor Huxley long ago described the church as "a branch of the civil service," but Lord Rosebery recently urged that the nation had as much right to set up a church as it has to maintain an army. It is strange that men who are acute upon general matters should be so blind as to the lack of consistency in their statements upon theological matters. If Lord Rosebery could show that the church, like the army, is for the defense of the whole nation, his statement would hav something in it. But this is not so, for the church is used for the defense of ancient folly and class interests. However, it is evidently too weak to exist by its own resources. This is granted by the bishops who hav issued a "manifesto" in reference to the Welsh Establishment, in which they say that if the bill recently introduced by the Home Secretary for the disestablishment of the church in Wales becomes law, its "direct financial provisions are such as to reduce the church to penury, and ultimately to leave her with practically no pecuniary resources for her reorganization and work in the future." Just so, the church is not strong enough, financially or otherwise, to support itself, but that is no reason why the nation should be taxed to perpetuate an institution to which the majority of the people are opposed. We are glad to see that the Baptists hav met and passed resolutions directing "the officers of the Union to sign on its behalf petitions to both Houses of Parliament, praying them to pass into law the government bills for disestablisment in Wales and Monmouthshire and Scotland." There is no doubt that in England we are upon the eve of radical changes in reference to the power of the church, and I hav strong hopes that before my career is closed, religion will be a question of individual opinion, and not of national injustice.

"THE SECULARIZATION OF THE PULPIT."

The above was the title of an address that has just been given by the President of the Congregational Union to its members. The reverend gentleman complains that throughout English society there is going on a slow and silent process of deterioration. Interests, "temporal, material, and even intellectual, are allowed to usurp the solemn verities of the blessed gospel. · · · Attention given to the social welfare of the people is a source of danger to the pulpit." If this be true, the sooner the pulpit is put to some useful purpose the better. The president advised ministers not to forget that their work is "not to save the body from suffering, but to deliver the soul from sin." This is what Freethinkers are constantly urging as the function of Christianity. Its business is not with this life. As Christ is reported to hav said: "My kingdom is not of this world." Then we hav no use for it, at least not at present, for our knowledge and duties are confined to this world, for the good reason that we know nothing of any other.

INTERESTING ITEMS.

A singular incident has just occurred in the north of England, where an archdeacon was presiding at the installation of a new clergyman. During his discourse the archdeacon remarked: "You saw the crowds outside witnessing the procession. The officers of the church specially urged them to come in, but not one entered out of that multitude. It reminds me of the late Bishop of Manchester, who once said: 'We preach Christianity, but those outside practice it.'" This home thrust has caused much tribulation among the saints in the north of England.

Three years ago when the system of free education came into force, steps were taken by the Education Department to induce parents to deposit in the savings bank for the benefit of the children, the money saved by the discontinuance of fees. Since then no fewer than 680,000 one-shilling and 270,000 four-shilling deposit slips hav been supplied to managers and teachers.

The twenty-sixth annual Coöperativ Congress has just been held in Sunderland in the county of Durham. From the official figures produced at the meeting it appears that in England coöperation has made marvelous progress. Within the comparativly short period of fifty years the small band of twenty-eight pioneers had transformed itself into an army numbering 1,240,013, representing about one-seventh of the population of the United Kingdom. The trade had grown into £50,318,977 annually, and the slender capital of £28, with which the pioneers proposed to rearrange the powers of production, distribution, education, and government, had grown into £14,063,687—no mean sum with which to tackle that complex and ambitious program. Coöperation rests upon the widest social and economic basis, and meets most completely the conditions imposed by modern industrial progress.

London, Eng. CHARLES WATTS.

A Sermon by Talmage.

(AS VIEWED BY A FREETHINKER.)

Some time ago Dr. Talmage preached an eloquent sermon on dreams, taking for his text Gen. xxviii, 11: "He took of the stones of that place and put them for his pillows, and he lay down in that place to sleep and he dreamed." Talmage goes on to cite many instances of God's communicating with people in dreams. Well, perhaps he did, but it seems to me it would hav been much more satisfactory to meet him during waking hours and hold a conversation with him; but then "God's ways are not our ways"—he always was erratic.

Talmage says: "I do believe in dreams"—meaning God's communications through them. What an interesting statement to follow out. If he believes in dreams he must hav a "dream book" to help him interpret God's meaning, for dreams do change about and mix up awfully, and he (Talmage) is above all things illogical—as I shall show you presently—so I'm sure he could not figure them out alone, and if he believes in dreams he must also believe in fortune-telling, for the two go together.

Let my imagination play a moment; it wants to peep into Talmage's breakfast room. The family are assembled; the reverend has a book in his hand and a morning paper lies on a side table. "I dreamed of picking up silver dollars last night till my pockets were full and weighted down [that was my dream, but as I don't attach any importance to it, I will willingly lend it to him], and even then at every step was another pile of silver coin," and he turns over the leaves of the book—I think it has a yellow back—and repeats softly, "Silver, silver, silver coin—here it is;" and all look interested.

Soon a young lady, perhaps she is a guest, says: "At Mrs. X. Y. Z.'s tea this afternoon we shall all hav our fortunes told by Madame Seventh Daughter, and I can hardly wait till 4 o'clock," and she looks timidly at the third finger of the left hand, which is still minus the golden circlet that tells of wedded bliss (or blister).

I wonder what dream book Talmage recommends and what peculiar method of fortune-telling he considers most reliable; it was an oversight not to hav mentioned them in his sermon; but then, not greater than others. All illogical minds are prone to oversight. But to come back to the sermon. It is under five heads:

1. "The scriptures are so full of revelation from God, that if we get no communication from him in our dreams, we ought, nevertheless, to be satisfied."

The silver dollar dream that I loaned Talmage is fully three months old and has not materialized yet (perhaps it went by the contrary), and I hav not dreamed another dream since; but I don't want those who dream incessantly to crow over me because God disturbs their slumbers every night. I still hav the revelations (by Heston) to console me.

2. "All dreams hav an important meaning. Every dream, whether agreeable or harassing, whether sunshiny or tempestuous, means so much that rising from your couch you ought to kneel down and say [does he mean ask?], 'O God! am I immortal?'" And Talmage figures it out conclusivly that man is immortal because he dreams, and if that is the case my beautiful bulldog Jack is immortal too, for he "dreams dreams and sees visions" so vividly that by his manifestations we are able to tell whether they are sunshiny or tempestuous; and Revelations mentions horses in heaven; so I don't see where any line can be drawn that will shut out cows, monkeys, cats, or any other animal with sufficient brains to dream.

3. "The vast majority of dreams are merely the result of a disturbed physical condition, and are not a supernatural message. · · · Anything you see while under the influence of chloral or brandy or hasheesh or laudanum, is not a revelation from God. · · · Do not mistake narcotic disturbance for divine revelation. Majority of dreams · · · the penalty of outraged digestiv organs."

That was very thoughtful in Talmage to warn his unthinking and uncritical congregation (all Christians are essentially non-thinkers and decidedly uncritical, or they would not be Christians) of the similarity of God's manifestations and indigestion, lest they mistake a salad nightmare for a revelation from God. But now that troubles me. If during my sleep a horse comes and sits on my stomach, and plants his fore-feet on my lungs and sneezes lightning in my face, by what shall I differentiate between a visit from God or the devil or the nightmare, especially if I hav been very busy the day before and hav forgotten what I ate?

Coleridge's "Kublai-Khan" was composed under the influence of some opiate, so of course God had nothing to do with it. Tartina, the violinist, composed his most wonderful sonata while asleep. What was his source of inspiration? If from God the piece is divine, and the church should lay exclusiv claim to it. If from indigestion, it would pay for all the musically inclined to cultivate indigestion. If I wish to commit a piece to memory, I read it carefully several times at night. In the morning I can repeat it save, perhaps, a few mistakes that two or three readings will correct. Why should I be able to repeat it in the morning, when I could not at night? Simple enough, and nothing supernatural about it, and no indigestion. The brain cells had received sufficient impression to keep the form going over and over in the same set of cells (i. e., to keep the same set of cells discharging their electric or nerve force), and when the impression became deep enough, it was what we call "committed to memory." After many years I wish to recall it; I start in wherever I can, and repeat as much as I can, over and over. Suddenly another line or verse comes to me, i. e., I start up an action in the same cells used before. My ability to recall it in its entirety depends upon the previous impression, whether slight or otherwise.

What is a thought? It is the discharge of the electric force in the brain cell, this discharge being brought about by some stimulation either inside or outside the body.

What is a dream? The same, but being asleep, we are not able to regulate the supply of the stimulus, and the discharge of the force is from the cells of the least resistance. Hence the irregularity and confusion of dreams. I hav often heard people say: "Oh, if I could talk or write as well in the day as I can think at night, I might say something really brilliant," and I had so often thought so myself that I put pencil and paper at the head of my bed, and when something brilliant (?) came into my mind and I awoke with the thought still vivid, I recorded it.

I thought I was preaching the funeral sermon of a child, and I said: "The skin of that child has never closed a teeth." Another time I thought I was lecturing on "Scotch Superstitions" (I had been reading Burns), and said: "To fear nothing means to hav no fear at midnight in the elfie hours. The timid and frightened usually forget to say 'Good-night,'" and in my half-waking moments I thought, Why, that is really true, for frightened people run away and don't stop to say anything; I wonder why I never noticed that before.

Why should my immortal soul use less sense and poorer grammar at night than in the daytime? What does daylight or darkness matter to a soul, or why should indigestion make a soul talk nonsense?

Remark fourth I hav included with the third.

5. "God has often, since the close of the Bible dispensation, appeared to people in dreams. . . . All dreams that make you better are from God. How do I know it? Is not God the source of all good? It doesn't take a very logical mind to argue that out." Logic! Shades of Plato! Will some one please tell me what size hat Mr. Talmage wears? I want to know the circumference of that logical (?) brain—but, no matter. "The heaviest brains on record, where the statements are to be relied upon, were possessed by an ignorant bricklayer and a congenital imbecil, both of whom outweighed Cuvier and Abercrombie, while a boy of thirteen years of age had five ounces more brain than Webster or Agassiz."

I was not aware that dreams had any influence either for good or evil among the majority of people. I should expect an old plantation aunty to lay some stress upon her dreams, but not intelligent, cultured people.

"Tertullian and Martin Luther believed in dreams." That's nothing; I used to believe in Santa Claus, but that doesn't prove anything save human credulity. "The night before his assassination the wife of Julius Cæsar dreamed that her husband fell dead across her lap." Coincident, that's all. People often dream of the death of some member of the family or of themselvs, but that is all that comes of it. Talmage narrates several instances where people warned in dreams hav gone to the rescue of some one in peril, and mentions a ship's crew being so miraculously rescued, and asks, "Who conducted that dream? The God of the sea." Wonderful! wonderful! But was that one crew all he could get around to see to, and what has that "God of the sea" been doing all this winter and spring while boat after boat has been wrecked and gone down? He mentions a German who, while on shipboard, was told in a dream to follow a man with a handful of white flowers. After he arrived in New York he wandered into the Fulton street prayer-meeting, and on the pulpit-stand was a bunch of tube-roses. When Mr. Lamphier—who conducted the meeting—went home he took the flowers, and the German followed, and through an interpreter told of his dream. The German is now a city missionary preaching the gospel to his countrymen. Well, that seemed to work very well for the German; but I should not feel it safe to advise the thousands of idle men in the United States today to watch for a man wearing a boutonniere and follow him, in hopes of work, for they would starve before they got it.

"Perhaps the reason the God of the seas let so many boats go down is because the crews did not call on God to save them," some Christian will say, "and if safety wasn't worth asking for it wasn't worth having." Bosh! If my baby hangs in the window in danger of falling to the pavement below, would I wait to be called upon to rescue him from his peril? Not much; almost before his danger can shape itself in thoughts in my mind he is safe in my arms. If a stranger is in danger of death from an incoming engin, do I wait till he asks for aid before I render it? No; with violence, if need be, I drag him to a place of safety, and say: "Beg pardon, but the engin was close upon you." He may think me officious, and say he is capable of taking care of himself, or he may thank me for my service; it doesn't matter either way; I considered him in danger and went to his rescue. If some member of my family needs shoes, do I wait to be teased for a new pair? No; my pleasure is to anticipate their needs and supply them with luxuries. "If ye, being evil, know how to giv good gifts unto your children," why should God wait for "much importuning" or withhold them entirely, or see lives lost on sea and land if he be an all-wise God who knows of the destruction, and an all-powerful God who can bid the winds and waves be still and they obey him?

DOCTOR.

Will some "beloved child of God" please stand up and tell a benighted and ignorant truthseeker how it was that "Adam called his wife's name Eve, because she was the mother of all living," when there was nothing living of which she was the mother at the time he named her? Perhaps some one named her since and made a mistake in telling the story.

At the Front.

It was about a five-hour ride from Meriden, Conn., to Boston, over a pleasing section of New England. Mr. L. S. Meston was at the station to meet me, and soon I was in the presence of Paine Memorial, an architectural beauty as well as a fitting monument to one of the greatest of mankind. In the Investigator office I found a warm welcome. Mr. Ernest Mendum nobly carries out the work which has canonized his father and Horace Seaver in the hearts of all lovers of mental liberty. For over sixty years this grand journal has fought the good fight, and Liberals may well be proud of it. Saturday evening I spent at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Mendum in Melrose Highlands, and my host and hostess spared no pains to make my visit a great pleasure, which it was.

Sunday afternoon finds me in Paine Hall, where the Ingersoll Secular Society holds regular meetings. Among the first to welcome me here was Mr. Rockwood, the president of the society, and in a few minutes I was greeted by the three Rushes—father and two sons, Reuben and Tom. Without this trinity there would be a great gap in Paine Hall. The elder Rush, an old associate of Bradlaugh, delights to narrate the story of the struggle for mental liberty in England. When you find an old-time English Freethinker you generally find a man that you can "tie to." The boys are activ in the cause, and hav also been very successful in business. Those who heard Reuben Rush at the International Congress will not forget his eloquent and fiery oratory. Mr. L. K. Washburn, the universally admired editor of the Investigator, was also present and an attentiv listener. Washburn is the most popular lecturer in Boston, and he can always fill Paine Hall to the doors. I lectured on "The Evidences of Christianity," and a warm discussion followed. The principal speaker was the Rev. Mr. Moore, a Scotch Presbyterian. Mr. Moore was in a half-standing posture throughout the lecture, that he might be the first one on the floor. He is very modest in his demands and would not accept the universe in a package if he could get it, even though he did ask the privilege of doing all the talking throughout the debate. Mr. Moore detests the Catholic church, does not think it has any rights, that its property should be confiscated, and its pr ests banished from the country. He is the embodiment of the Protestant spirit of persecution, and his antics while speaking make him the comedian of Paine Hall. After the lecture we repaired to the hospitable home of the Rushes, where we had a most pleasant time.

On Monday afternoon I left Boston for Harwich, on Cape Cod, where I was engaged to giv two lectures. Mr. B. F. Robbins made the arrangements, and took upon himself most of the expense. Harwich is far from being a Liberal town. The old Puritan spirit is yet there. Mr. Robbins is the only outspoken, aggressiv Freethinker that I found. My audience was composed almost entirely of Spiritualists, who were attentiv and appreciativ.

My next appointment was Oysterville, which I reached by stage from West Barnstable. I was met on my arrival by Mr. Daniel Crosby, at whose hospitable home I was well entertained during my stay in town. Mr. Crosby's wife and daughter are both Liberals to the heart and take an activ interest in the Freethought movement. In the evening I was pleased to see a fine audience. Captain Handy and his daughter, Miss Emma, drove over from Cotuit. The Crosby orchestra delighted the audience with some well chosen selections. The audience was appreciativ and seemed to indorse all I said. The next day Captain Handy drove me over to Cotuit, where I gave two lectures. Here the audiences were small, as the Freethought element is weak, but the short visit with Captain Handy and his family, in the midst of the beauties of land and sea, softened the disappointment a lecturer sometimes feels when he gets poor houses. Mr. W. A. Makepiece and his brother came up from Hyannis both evenings though the weather was most unfavorable. It was my fortune to meet on the Cape some of the best Liberals that I hav come in contact with, and I left longing for the time when I can come back.

When I returned to Boston I found a warm welcome again in the Rush home, and on Sunday I had a larger audience than at the previous meeting. The Rev. Mr. Moore again appeared, and for a while we had a hot debate. The hardest thing for Mr. Moore to see is the fact that Protestants are opponents of religious liberty to-day as well as Catholics. An Adventist minister also made a few remarks, agreeing almost entirely with me in my position.

After lecturing in small places it is a great relief to a lecturer to speak in Boston, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, or New York, where an intelligent and cultured audience givs him their attention. It is a treat to him, and is an encouragement in a work that has many trials and disappointments.

THE Manhattan Liberal Club could be appropriately called "The Club of Dreams" last Friday night when Elmer E. Warner spoke on "Tides of the Times." It was a dream that the audience listened to, and to make the dream appear a real one some of the audience slept, and it took Dr. Foote, Jr., with his gavel, after the lecture, to make many awake from their sleep, and to comprehend that the dream was o'er. The lecturer in starting out said that though the title of his paper was a purposely ambiguous one, he would tell them how things could be two hundred years from now. Accordingly he took a "tumble" and found himself in New York two centuries from date. He found things much improved, and everything was really beautiful, and everyone happy and comfortable. This paper was of the class of utopian literature of which "Looking Backward" is fairly representativ. The lecturer thinks that such papers arouse thought. Whether this paper points to the "the tides of the times" was to some minds an open question.

Representativ Durborow has hit the popular fancy in Washington by a proposition that appeals to every intelligent household in the capital. It is to open on Sunday all public institutions in which there is aught for exhibition, and to extend the time of opening during week days. As it is, that great and incomparable museum, the Smithsonian Institution, is closed every day at 4 o'clock, is closed on Sundays and even on holidays. The thousands of people in the departments are practically denied opportunity to visit these places, and the same is true of the Congressional Library and the Corcoran Art Gallery. So it is only the rich or the idle who may enjoy the treasures of art and education that the law declares shall be free to the people.—Charleston News and Courier.

Church edifices and land alone, exclusiv of parsonages, colleges, and the like, are valued at $680,687,106, and it is probable this would need to be at least doubled to include all other church property. It is safe to put the value of church property in the United States at $1,361,374 000. It is a question which seriously disturbs ministers and laymen alike whether an element of society that is so rich ought to ask any exemption from the burdens that fall alike on rich and poor, especially when the churches receive all the benefits of government that the humblest citizen can claim.—Chicago Record.

It has been found by careful calculation that the biblical reports of the dimensions of Noah's ark are erroneous. In order to carry the animals and food for them necessary to make the trip, the word "miles" should be substituted for the word "cubits."

I get THE TRUTH SEEKER every week, but that is not much good, as my wife reads that all to herself, and hardly gives me a chance at it. Then my boy devours the pictures, which do him a world of good. WM. P. HANSEN.

But They Will Not Always Slight Him.

LAKEPORT, N. H., June 4, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1 for Ingersoll's address on Thomas Paine, "The Ingersoll Controversy," "What Must We Do to be Saved?" "The Age of Reason," and "Common Sense."

I will say that I hav distributed the sample copies you sent me in places where I thought they would do the most good. There are quite a number of Liberals here in this end of the city.

In the afternoon of Memorial day I listened to an address delivered by Dr. J. A. Green, and also an illustrated lecture on the Civil War, but Thomas Paine's name was not mentioned, the man who did more for the independence of this country and France than all others combined.

Yours respectfully, C M. CARLETON.

About Providential Judgments.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., May 14, 1894.

MR EDITOR: The World says some attribute Joseph Remilleard's sudden death in Calumet, Mich., to a judgment for his blasphemy. To what do they attribute the thrice-providential burning of Talmage's church? Did he not libel, slander, and insult God by substantially declaring that, by Breckinridge-Pollard behavior, he (God) begot a son—simply because he found it in an interpolated, anonymous old book? Aye, did he not substantially charge him with worse conduct than Breckinridge, for Miss Pollard never married, while Mary did; and while Breckinridge assumed the expense and responsibility for his meanness, did he (Talmage) not charge God with shifting his off on Joseph? For money—like a lobbyist—did he not constantly advise people to bribe God Almighty (with church contributions, prayers, etc.) to lay their sins on his innocent son Jesus?

May not the latter case be as much a manifestation of judgment as the former?

Soul Existence.

LEXINGTON, KY., June 2, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: "And God breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul." But science teaches that soul is a result of a combination of forces—an organization, a power or spark of existence, kept alive and conscious by electricity, sensation being a kind of knowledge derived from contact with the outside world. Man revels in his dignity, as a splendid exotic, defending his laws and constitutions from the grasp of ignorance; but alas! the proclivities of the brute cling to him till he is not able to govern himself, and lingers in the sphere of the ape. Who hav ascended into the hights—forgotten themselvs, lived and died for the world? Terence, Voltaire, Thomas Paine, D M. Bennett. A blazing torch is borne aloft by Ingersoll.

A glorious light is burning here, and many rejoice in its beams. The poor and wretched stop suddenly in their work, to read what he has written. It is the mind of Mr. Charles Moore to which I allude. This is a worthy gentleman, a champion of the poor, a truly great man—a friend of justice, truth, and benevolence. He helps the poor and is kind to all. Of course he is respected by high-souled, honorable people. Yours respectfully, ALHAZA.

No Danger of Putnam Retiring on His Wealth.

FARMINGTON, UTAH, June 1, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I send you $7.75, to renew my subscription to your valuable paper, for "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," "Right Living," and five copies Paine Memorial Number.

Like the rest, am desirous of having my name in the big book. No doubt Brother Putnam has done justice to the title of his book, and, if patronized as it deserves, it would be his support for many years; yet our educated and gifted writers and lecturers should not cease their labors, even if financially able to do so. Though Freethought seems to be slowly yet surely gaining strength, let us not forget that eternal vigilance is the price of the liberty we now enjoy. The "financial crisis" and the "industrial army" movement seem to be the topics "out West" at present. I hear many ask the question, "What are Ingersoll's views regarding this moving of idle men to Washington?" You know many of our Freethought faith look upon Robert Ingersoll as the saints did upon Brigham Young, as able to reveal an answer to many knotty questions. May we hear from his able mind as to what this movement means to the future of our government and country.

Wishing success to all who are laboring to free this world of superstition, I am,

Yours truly, HECTOR W. HAIGHT.

Thinks Heston Has More Genius than God.

WANDA, ILL., June 3, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I am but twenty-two years old, but so far hav escaped the horrors of feeling that when done with this life I will hav to take chances on either going to a paradise or to a burning hell Am a whole-souled Atheist, Infidel, or Freethinker, just whichever jars the least on a pious brain. Do not take THE TRUTH SEEKER, but through the kindness of a friend (Mr. Malcom McBride, of McBride, Ia., who, by the way, has taken your paper for twenty years), I exchange and get it. Will surely subscribe before I will go without it. I think there is more downright truth stated in THE TRUTH SEEKER than in the Old and New Testaments combined.

It looks as though the all powerful, far-seeing God is taking a year off, or at all events he is not looking after his little, starving, innocent children, and has also let his great universe slip a cog and freeze everything up two or three times this season, but hav faith in the above-named (all-for-the-best-God), and you hav the Christian key to the mishap. Perhaps some good brother was praying for rain and another for the absence thereof, and God has got things mixed.

I am much pleased with Heston's cartoons; he is a genius and is in the right place. I find a good many of our class here and am trying to do something for you by way of subscriptions. I cannot get "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" yet, but am bound to hav it sooner or later. Success to you and THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Yours truly, HARRY M. KEELEY.

The Demand for the "Age of Reason."

BELLEVUE, KY., May 20, 1894.

MR EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1 for six copies of Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason." I hav sold about fifteen copies and did not half try. I see in the few last numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER that some of the A P. A. are being called down by some of our friends, because they try to hav the Bible in our public schools. Now, here, friends, is where you can do some good. I am an A. P. A., and hav sold some of Mr. Paine's "Age of Reason" at our meetings. This is what I say to them: "Friends, this is the 'Age of Reason,' written by Thomas Paine, who said that a king and a priest are two vultures, hatched from the same egg." By the time you hav said a few more words you will find that you can sell at least ten copies, and anyone who reads the "Age of Reason" will not want the Old Book in our schools. Now, then, let every A. P. A. who reads THE TRUTH SEEKER send for as many copies as he thinks he will sell; then send for more, until every home in the United States has one.

Mr. Paine was a great and good man, and his name should go down the ages of history along with Washington, Jefferson, and many others. We can keep silent no longer. Let us put Mr. Paine's name where it rightfully belongs, for he was the greatest man living at his time.

I hav ordered extra copies of the Paine Memorial Illustrated, through my newsdealer, and hope that every society will do its utmost to giv this number a wide and large circulation, so the world may hear something of Mr. Paine. I hav his picture (a large, fine painting) and his works, and when the 29th of January comes around we all get around a large table filled with good things, and spend the day in memory of America's greatest hero and author.

I turn down E O. Roscoe, likewise Otto Wettstein. His "Giant Delusion" is all in his mind, because, as he sees it, we are living in a very small world, and we might bump one another in the next one. Otto, don't be afraid; you will hav plenty of room, and some day, when you are in the spirit world, you will tell us mortals that it is a giant delusion to believe that when a man dies he is dead.

Address—168 Berry avenue, Bellevue, Ky. LOUIS HELD.

Gambetta Did Not Recant.

CHAMPAIGN, ILL., May 29, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Send me the following of Ingersoll's productions: "Address Before the Unitarian Club," "Truth of History," "Ingersoll on McGlynn."

A friend, some time ago, displayed a clipping from a Chicago paper setting forth the statement that Father Lambert, who held a controversy with Ingersoll some years ago, had renounced the Catholic church and Catholicism I hav never seen the statement elsewhere. Will THE TRUTH SEEKER tell what it knows about the affair? I once asked you for evidence on the last days of Gambetta, for a minister stated in the pulpit that Gambetta in his last hours repented his unbelief, but there was no reply. I hav been unable to procure evidence on this point.

PERRY C. JOHNSON.

[The Catholic priest who has recently joined the Methodists is A. Lambert, a Redemptorist. The priest who criticised Colonel Ingersoll is L. A. Lambert, and he is still an activ Catholic. Ask the minister for proof that Gambetta repudiated his Freethought principles. There is none, absolutely none. He died as he had lived, an Infidel. He distinctly ordered that he should be buried without religious rites, and his wishes were scrupulously respected, as similar wishes could not hav been in the case of any statesman outside of France. Says Frederic Harrison, referring to the concourse of one million citizens who bore him to his grave: "There was no emblem of Christ, no priest of God, not one mutter of heaven, no hollow appeal to the mockery of the resurrection, no thought but for the great human loss and human sorrow. It was the first time in the history of Europe that a foremost man had been laid to rest by a nation in grief, without priest or church, prayer or hymn."—ED. T. S.]

His Courage Failed Him.

CRAYON, O., May 19, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find amount that will pay my subscription up to September 1st. My interest in your valuable journal and its many Liberal publications is steadily increasing. I find that after ten years' experience with the same nothing can solve or define the problems of life or appease my longings for facts and reason as can the grand old TRUTH SEEKER.

The premium club which I sent you and which secures Mr. Putnam's great book is working satisfactorily so far. Each subscriber is well pleased with the book, "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated." When Mr. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" arrives I am confident that I shall be the fortunate possessor of the greatest book of modern times.

I had the pleasure, about two weeks since, of hearing for the first time our eloquent lecturer, John R. Charlesworth. I enjoyed the hospitality of Mr. George Van Ness and the spirited company of the lecturer and made the acquaintance of a number of Liberals while there. An incident occurred during these lectures that demands a brief mention. The intelligence came to the ears of mine Liberal host, Mr. Van Ness, that the Rev. G E. McManaman, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church of the city, had defiantly stated that he had about five questions to ask our lecturer. Mr. Van Ness decided that the reverend gentleman should be accommodated. So we set out to giv him a formal invitation to present them in person that night. We called at the cozy parsonage, where we found the object of our visit. He came to the door, seemingly very much embarrassed, and, after the usual ceremony, I broke the ice. He admitted making the statement. Then we kindly invited him to attend the lecture that night and present his questions in person, but his pious courage failed him. He squarely refused, saying that he was so busy that he had not time to "formulate" them. We again insisted, assuring him every courtesy and respect, but his religious ambition had vanished, as neither questions nor preacher were forthcoming at night. ELMER MILLER.

An Open Letter to an Angell.

BOULDER, COL., March 7, 1894.

MR. GEO. T. ANGELL, No. 19 Milk st., Boston, Dear Sir: The paper (Our Dumb Animals) which you so kindly sent me I hav read very carefully and in its main object I fully and freely agree with you; in other respects I cannot, viz., when you take the old Bible and that God of the Jews and Christians as patterns of kindness and mercy; in this respect you are just as far off as you can possibly be and not get out of the universe. I know of no book as bad for teaching cruelty to animals as well as human beings as the Bible. I will guarantee to show you ten places where cruelty is sanctioned where you can show one in which it is condemned. And of all the gods which man has created, I think that the god Jehovah is the worst and most cruel, if there could be any choice. I am an unbeliever in this abominably cruel and wicked book. I do not favor cruelty to animals nor to man, woman, nor child, neither here nor in an imaginary hereafter. And I elieve in this respect I am a little better than your God.

The only agent that this county has had for years for the Humane Society is just about my belief, with the addition that he is a Spiritualist. He was recently called on to prosecute two brothers, who claim to be Christians and take the Bible for their guide, for both claiming marital rights from the wife of one of them, and subjecting her to maltreatment. They are both lying in jail now waiting for their trial for this crime. In the same jail there is another victim of religious superstition, who is laboring under the delusion that he has committed the, or some, unpardonable sin. I saw them all there only an hour or two ago.

Would like to hav you publish the above and send me a copy of the paper, if you dare to print so much truth.

LATER.—The two brothers mentioned above hav since been sentenced to fifteen years in the penitentiary and taken to Canon City to serve it out.

An Exceptional Corner of Quay's State.

MR. EDITOR: I herewith inclose $5—$3 for the renewal of my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and $2 for Darwin's "Origin of Species." Other remittances for books and other reading matter may be expected from me as I get time to read them.

I am inclined to think that the poverty of Freethinkers is not as great as some "letters of friends" would lead us to suppose. At all events, a large per cent of the people through this part of "God's moral vineyard" are Freethinkers, and they are generally not only the most honorable and intellectual citizens, but are in the best circumstances financially—they are mostly readers and real thinkers, and the majority take some kind of a Liberal paper, or get some one's else to look over. True, the greater part of them do not contribute their means and energies to the cause of Liberalism with the same zeal that some of our orthodox neighbors giv to the support of superstition. But it must be remembered that Liberals generally are striving to improve their earthly existence, supplying themselvs with home comforts, while hide-bound, religious bigots are most vitally concerned in laying up treasures in mythical realms somewhere beyond the skies. Besides, it is well known that Infidels do not hav divine assurance that if they cast their bread and butter upon the waters, it will swim back to them again after a time, laden with abundant increase; and it occurs to only a few of them that it is vitally important to keep up a ceaseless warfare against principles which are so palpably injurious to every interest of individual well-being of all classes, the priesthood perhaps excepted. Doubtless this is because only those who hav risen from the tomb of darksome superstition can fully realize the abject condition into which a belief in supernaturalism is really capable of plunging human intelligence; and comparativly few Freethinkers hav full knowledge of the enervating forces of ecclesiastical tuition. It is then in this misconception of the power which bigotry exerts in blinding and misguiding the minds of its victims so that it becomes next to impossible for them to see and comprehend the plainest truths whenever they in anyway oppose their preconceived notions; in the lack of enthusiasm; in the want of leisure to read and investigate, and in the differences of opinion and taste as to what is the most remunerativ reading in the field of Liberalism, that we must look for the reason why it is so difficult to procure large subscription lists for THE TRUTH SEEKER, rather than in the lion's grip of poverty. It is a probable fact that very few Freethinkers can be found who would not subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER if no other reason could be given but the financial inability to procure it. But may subscriptions continue to be sufficiently numerous to secure for it a long and prosperous existence. THE TRUTH SEEKER, to say the least, is among the most worthy exponents of Liberalism now published. Every lover of the rights of man should take and read it.

Your truly, F. N. MORTON.

Woman Suffrage.

NEW YORK, N. Y., May 18, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I would like to say a few words about woman suffrage. I do not believe in granting the wholesale right of suffrage to women, for fundamental and social reasons. The only plausible argument in its favor, that I know of, is that of taxation without representation. That is the best of reasons and should control. What we want is not to enfranchise all of our sisters and daughters and aunts and wives, the simple and learned alike, but such of them as own property or can pass an educational test. We want to disfranchise many of the men who now vote, and enfranchise a few of the more manly women; and the way to do it is to enact a law or frame it into our state constitution that those persons only, without regard to sex, shall be entitled to vote for public officers and hold office, after a period of ten or twenty years, who can pass a satisfactory examination as to the designs of constitutional government, and understand something of its law processes, as well as hav a common school, English education. Ten to twenty years' notice would giv the present male voters ample time to prepare for the educational test, and at the same time would giv an opportunity for those women who wish to take part in government to prepare themselvs for that function.

The negroes in the South are not allowed to vote, or their votes are not counted, and while the issue is confined to the state of New York as far as this present discussion is concerned, still, if woman suffrage should win in this state, it would be contagious; and what is the use of enfranchising all the colored women of the South when even many of the males are still perhaps rightfully, if not lawfully, disfranchised? A republic must hav an intelligent, not an ignorant ballot.

If said to a crowd of women, "You do not care to assume the duties and responsibilities of political life, do you?" they will answer, "No." Put the question the other way and say, "Would you not like to take part in government so as to be able to enforce your rights?" and they will vote "Yes." Women are so susceptible to a bouquet of flowers or perfume, that the candidate who pleased their fancy in those respects the most would be sure of election.

I hav listened to several women agitators of this question. Some of their arguments are of a motherly nature, which, of course, would be all right in the nursery, but one hardly expects to hear that kind of advice from the political platform. They lead one's thoughts yearningly back to the period of childhood and call to mind the tender care of a devoted mother, but the state is not founded on sentimentality.

For physical reasons, women can never take rank with men in muscular labor, and for that reason a vote in the hands of a woman would allow her to that extent to enslave the man. She could vote for him to carry out projects in which she could directly take no part. The question of woman suffrage is hardly worth considering seriously, only from the standpoint of an educational test. It is unjust for men to vote who do not hold real property, while those women who do hold such property are deprived of the right of suffrage. The remedy proposed above is fair and just, and would be the best policy for both society and the state. It is my opinion that the voters at the polls, if not the Constitutional Convention, will look upon the question of woman suffrage as an enormous joke.

Incidentally I will say I attended the debate recently at the Young Men's Christian Association on this question, and the debaters were so hemmed in by their religion that intellectually they reminded me of a swarm of bees flying about in a hive, but thinking they were flying around the globe. The debaters did not get outside of the narrow domain of their religious belief. No one dared mention, or perhaps has not even thought of, the additional dangerous power woman suffrage might giv the church. The judge gave the decision to the negativ side, because shown that the ballot would be of tremendous disadvantage to women themselvs (not but what they are capable of voting) and their votes would neither help nor injure the state.

I hope the eleventh hour of waiting for "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" will not be too long, as I am getting very hungry for a broader knowledge of the past, and of the future possibilities of Freethought. L. D. CRINE.

In the Hawkeye State.

CARROLL, IA., June 1, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: While in Iowa City the other day I visited the home of Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Deitz. Mr. Deitz is a sterling, consistent Freethinker, and has been a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER just twenty years. He is engaged in insurance and real estate, and is highly respected for his business integrity. I had met Mrs. Deitz during the World's Fair. She is an English lady of remarkable intellectual gifts, having been for some years instructor in languages at the state university, which occupies the old capitol building here and several annexes. Mrs. Deitz continues to instruct private classes in French, German, and other tongues. She is the activ worker in a local society, the Shakspere Club, preparing much of the work and taking a leading part in the discussions.

Iowa City, about a week before my arrival, had experienced the worst hailstorm known in its history. Tin and sheet-iron roofs were pelted full of holes, and the Deitz's house was no more fortunate than the rest. Tens of thousands of dollars damage was done Every unprotected pane of glass facing the direction of the storm was broken. One wholesale house alone lost $6,000. At Mr. Deitz's I had an opportunity to glance at THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 19th last, and was astonished to read your bracketed remark that a page had been lost, making "Mr. M —" an impenetrable mystery. As there is no necessity for that, I desire to drag him from the obscurity which the article as printed implies. [Such calamities might be avoided if all writers would get out of the very bad habit of using an initial instead of a name. It is a sort of literary affectation which possesses no merit, and for which there is no excuse. —ED.]

While in Carroll, Ia., I had a pleasant visit with Mr. and Mrs. W. T. Minchen. Mr. Minchen is a banker and successful business man, a radical individualist, and a member of THE TRUTH SEEKER family. Mrs. Minchen, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Bean, of Rock Island, Ill., I had the pleasure of meeting many times. Mrs. Minchen is a great reader, and much taken with the Arena and Twentieth Century. She is a woman of culture, refinement, good sense, and radical. She has literary ambitions, but her failing health has thwarted them. Their home is a charming spot.

Mr. Minchen prides himself on blooded stock and his stables contain some aristocratically pedigreed ponies, which he keeps for his "amusement," as he terms it. He piloted me to his barn, lit by incandescent electric lamps and affording by no means undesirable quarters. Here I found he kept lodgers—three specimens of the genus tramp—whom he pointed out to me with special pride. It is customary for town and deputy marshals to arrest all parties guilty of the unpardonable crime of poverty. In many cases these limbs of the law induce these tramps to commit an offense so they can secure a dollar or so for their arrest. To such exalted ideas of government Mr Minchen is not particularly favorable, and if a tramp wishes to secure a good place and plenty for his stomach, he regales Mr. Minchen with harrowing tales of the cruelty of town marshals and, with his chronic detestation of government mixed with a good deal of the milk of human kindness, the hobo discovers that he has struck what he classically terms a "a snap." However, this is a good thing for both, as it brings adversity in touch with prosperity. May many more practice it.

In Des Moines once more, I meet with Mr. Colbeck, an ardent truth seeker, and Mr. and Mrs Steele. In the latter's home is always a hearty welcome for a Freethinker. I am here spending Sunday, but am more lonesome than usual, as Franklin Steiner has gone down to St. Joe to giv some lectures.

Since last writing, the death of General Trumbull has occurred. The following letter to his wife briefly expresses my sentiments:

MAQUOKETA, IA., May 11, 1894.

DEAR MRS. TRUMBULL: I learned to-day the sad intelligence, and hasten to tender you, in this bereavement, my sincere sympathy. In the General's death I hav lost a noted countryman, a noble comrade, and a true friend. There was none for whom I had greater admiration; whose counsel I should prefer or whose opinions I held in greater esteem. It pains me to think that imperativ business will deter my attendance at the funeral. In these threatening times the death of such a sturdy, fearless thinker is an irreparable loss to all who hope for progress.

General Trumbull was an intellectual beacon-light of the century, possessing, in a supreme degree, moral and physical courage. Truly he was a king in the domain of thought and, as thought is imperishable, he certainly has attained immortality by his works.

In his death we can giv a new interpretation to the cry: Le roi est mort—vive le roi. Whence comes such another?

E. A. STEVENS.

I recently visited "our own Rochelle," famous among Freethinkers as the home of the Materialistic sage, Otto Wettstein. At his delightful residence, where Mrs. Wettstein's charming presence always agreeably adds to one's hearty welcome, I also met Mr. Wettstein's cousin, an intelligent lady from historic Heidelberg, who is visiting this country.

I find that Otto Wettstein, Jr., has largely taken the burden of the jewelry business, while his father is devoting himself more to study and literature, a field for which he is remarkably well adapted, but the pecuniary interests of publishers will for a long time cause them to fight shy of his radicalism.

The Chicago Herald is publishing a series of articles from people who are invited to giv their reasons why they do not go to church. This I mentioned to our friend, and in yesterday's issue I find Otto Wettstein has given the best of the series in an article of powerful logic on the impossibility of the existence of the Christian deity. Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Independence Day.

The birthdays of our kin are festival days
Of family union and innocent plays,
That bring to us pleasing remembrances bright
Of the time when each dear one first saw the light.
The birth-times of nations are seldom made sure
By monument, relic, or history obscure;
But our natal birth-time is known far and nigh
As the year '76, on the Fourth of July.
Now, on each recurrence of this glorious day
We hang out our banners and bid the bands play;
We bring out the cannon and let the world know
What will happen the nation that dares be our foe.
And the live boy is out in the early morn
With pistol, torpedoes, and screeching tin horn—
Bound to hav on the Fourth more freedom and fun
If he loses a finger and bursts the old drum!
The clouds may send greeting in thunderous tone,
While the boy makes thunder and lightning at home!
Then the girls patriotic will love all the boys,
But will love most the boy who makes the most noise.
There is no use of priest on this festiv day;
The boys take no stock in what he has to say.
E'en he may on this day relax his set grin—
Think the use of brimstone a pardonable sin,
Though his preaching implies that he'd giv all he hath
To save all the brimstone for his God's day of wrath.
On this jubilee day of all days in the year,
For gods, devils, and priests there is less of fear.
Now, the moral is plain: The enjoyment of life
Cures the crazy disease of the heavenly strife,
So our health to preserve and liv without fear,
We must hav some Fourth fun every day in the year.
And be honest, be brave, be free, and be wise;
Let myths, gods, and devils fight it out in the skies.

The Inquirendo Club.

II.

Our assembled meeting was called to order by President Florence the following Saturday at half-past two o'clock, as agreed. The election of officers took some time, because a few were very urgent about having Aunt Margaret president, and Florence had taken that honor upon herself. Finally, it was all settled amicably enough, with our valuable auntie as secretary, whose duty it was to read reports and write topics for discussion.

The exercises began with an essay from Lillie, Florence's youngest sister, aged twelve. It was entitled, "Hiawatha's Chickens: How They Liv and What They Do." "Birds is the subject of my story," she began, in a quaint, wise little way, "and these dear, tiny, feathered friends of nature, whom the little Indian boy called his 'chickens,' hav interested me greatly. I hav endeavored to write out a concise, faithful account of them, from which I hav been obliged to exclude much it would hav been well to add because of the necessity to be brief as possible.

"The encyclopedia tells us," she continued, "that 'birds belong to the second class of vertebrated animals and to the first class of oviparous vertebrated animals, including all the oviparous animals which hav warm blood.'

"Before going any farther, I desire to explain why it is that there should be a first, second, and even third class of vertebrated animals. Scientists group them thus because of the distinction that birds and animals possess regarding the vertebra. And, like the traditional doctors, they disagree. Professor Owen givs four classes and Professor Huxley admits only three. Their reasons, given, would admit so many technical phrases that I hav been obliged to exclude them.

"It is interesting to note in regard to these vertebrated oviparous animals, as elucidated by my cyclopedia, that, owing to the general flexibility in the neck—forming a contrast to the general stiffness of the vertebral column—the little feathered flock are enabled to make ready use of their bills or bring their heads into positions impossible to the mammalia. The coquettish turns of the neck, whereby the canary and wren hav become famous in song, are owing to the head and neck being articulated by a single pivot or condyle. And flying is accomplished by the action of the wings upon the elastic, unresisting air. The laws of gravitation bring into action muscles of the birds no other class possess, who do not fly.

"Our little harbingers of spring and summer are called birds of passage, because they fly from one country to another according to the seasons. The rapidity of their flight varies from fifty to one hundred and fifty miles an hour. Their swift, easy motion through boundless space, clearing without a pause the mighty ocean, made them the subject of a peculiar art of divination. The ancient Romans held them as 'sure messengers from the gods.' Religion has borrowed many of its symbols from them, and in the heart of the poet they shall ever liv, through

Summers of sun, winters of snow,
Springs full of sap's resistless flow.

"Constant and true to his calling will the 'little Hiawatha' find his 'chickens,' and when

Into the forest straightaway
All alone walked Hiawatha
Proudly, with his bow and arrows,
And the birds sang round him, o'er him,
"Do not shoot us, Hiawatha!"
Sang the robin, the opechas—
Sang the bluebird, the Owaissa,
"Do not shoot us, Hiawatha!"

"Let us hope he will heed the plea."

They all applauded when she ceased speaking and voted it the best thing they had ever heard. Lillie had surprised them all, for not even Aunt Margaret suspected she had written an essay of that length, or could write one. They did not doubt it now, for, though it was easy to see she had perused her cyclopedia a great deal, it still seemed wonderful to them for a child of her age.

Arthur broke the eloquent silence with a query—"Who was Pascal?"

Aunt Margaret answered: "He was a French writer, born in the year 1623. He was very superstitious and eccentric, but also possessed great ingenuity and power of expression. Falling a victim to the prevalency of all forms of superstition in France he developed very peculiar and extreme ideas upon religion. Abhorring all things pertaining to pleasure, he finally died, owing to rigorous abstinences fatally contrary to the laws of health, at the early age of thirty-nine. Pascal suffered much and gloried in it. To sympathizing friends he would cry, "Pity me not, for sickness is the natural state of Christians; because, when a man is sick, he is just as he ought to be always—enduring the privation of all good, all pleasure."

"He must hav been a very strange man," mused Lillie.

"Undoubtedly one of those ancient fanatics," commented Arthur.

"Certainly his doctrins look fanatical to us in the light of this century," assented Aunt Margaret; "both highly absurd and incongruous. But it was a very earnest matter to him. He was entirely consistent in all things. He did not prescribe for others, but for himself; though he ruthlessly trampled upon life's fairest flower, it was of the 'seed he had planted,' and he took the consequences thereof upon himself."

"A poem from Ernestine," announced Florence when Aunt Margaret had finished. Immediately a tall, slender girl of seventeen, cousin of the president, arose. She was visiting at Woodland Place during that summer. She smiled at Florence's announcement, and said: "My poetic productions resemble those of the 'autocrat at the breakfast table'—they are spontaneous; and I hope you will not look as dismayed as the 'schoolmistress,' or feel so"

Far out upon the boundless deep—
The stars above, the waves below—
The night her silent vigil keeps
In the moonbeam's wavering glow;
Half dreaming, I gaze afar
In the dark'ning gloom of night,
While onward we sail to the harbor bar,
Awake in the morning light!

Thus drifting o'er the glistening waves
Thoughts enter my heart unbidden
Of mysteries in dim, vaulted caves
Where countless treasures lie hidden;
Yet, true to our course, we glide apace,
Past distant isles afar,
To arrive at length in our destined place,
Safe at the harbor bar.

"Splendid," they agreed, in one unanimous voice, while promptly at the stroke of four Aunt Margaret read the minutes and the club adjourned until next meeting.

IDA BALLOU.

A Prize Offering.

NEW YORK, N. Y., April 5, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: In the Children's Corner of THE TRUTH SEEKER over the signature of I. A. Ballou is an account of the Inquirendo Club. With thanks for the compliment to that part of me which is alone worthy, the enduring thoughts, I venture to make a trifling offering to the children who may by the means of honest, earnest, and happy inquiry be led into a life of noble aims, profitable endeavor, and certain results. Do not, I beg of you, let inquiry be limited to the discovery of negations. These are abundant. Seek the positiv, the perpetual, the really immortal.

The principles that control the universe are eternal; their forms are continually changing. In striving to eradicate superstition, say nothing, teach nothing implying that this brief opportunity called life is all. It is not all. The characters we make for ourselvs are ourselvs, and these inevitably survive in the effects they hav upon future lives.

The Christian myth is nearer truth than any material fact. The Christian principles are true. They are simple and not at all mysterious. It requires no mental effort, no "opinion," to "believe." Love truth with all thy heart and with all thy mind, and thy neighbor as thyself. Earnestly, ardently, reverently seek the truth; not arrogantly nor with any prejudice for our own "views," and speed the time when all shall know alike, and do right because it is right. Your sincere friend,

HUDOR GENONE.

P.S.—If you care to offer a little incentiv to the children of the Corner I will giv a cloth copy of "Inquirendo Island" to the child under eighteen who, in one hundred words, best defines the idea of God, that is, tells truthfully what that word ought to represent to the future Freethinker.

H. G.

[The above was intended as a personal and private letter, but as Mr. Genone has kindly consented to its publication we therefore place it before our readers. In relation to the same we would like to say that we Corner folk are real truth seekers, and we endeavor "to follow Truth where'er she leads the way."

We do not quite understand how a myth, (fable) Christian or pagan, can be "nearer truth than any material fact," and would like to be enlightened upon that point.

Without further comment we would respectfully call the attention of our readers to the P.S. of the above letter and expect all our young persons eligible to reply, to giv briefly and concisely, their definition of the idea of God. the replies to be submitted to the author of "Inquirendo Island," who shall decide as to the excellence and correctness of the ideas.

Mr. Genone will please accept our thanks for his kindly interest in the Children's Corner.—ED. C. C.]

APOLLONIUS OF TYANA IDENTIFIED AS THE CHRISTIAN JESUS.

An important and remarkable revelation concerning the life and times of Apollonius of Tyana, the great sage and philosopher of the first century. It is here claimed that his life and teachings were appropriated and utilized by the formulators of the Christian religion in the interest of so-called Christianity. The plagiarism is made plain in this brief history of Apollonius, especailly in view of the historical references and comments thereon. It is quite evident that to conceal the plagiarism, the name of Apollonius was suppressed.

CHEAP EDITION.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

Just Out.—25 Cents.—Five Copies for $1.

A Liberal living in Michigan said once that he would give $25 a year to have the Crimes of Preachers recorded, as the frequent lapses of virtue of the ministers showed how little value Christianity possesses to make men moral.

We have just issued the Fourth Edition of the book doing this. The additions for this new edition of the

"Crimes of Preachers"

shows nearly 400 cases of ministerial conduct. While those in previous editions show that within a few years about

of one kind or another of criminal conduct. Most of the crimes are against women, for the fair sex are at once the weakness and the strength of the church—"the church" meaning of course the clergy.

Notwithstanding the many additional pages, we have kept the price the same, 25 cents. Send for a copy, and confound the churchmen. Show them just what sorts of scamps are the clergy who have closed the World's Fair on Sunday, because it is so holy a day that to look upon machinery or paintings in this period is "immoral."

Containing in condensed and systematized form a vast amount of evidence against the superstitious doctrines of Christianity. As a book of reference and aid to all truth seekers it is invaluable. Its wide variety of subjects include all the disputed points between Christianity and Freethought

PEN PICTURES OF THE WORLD'S FAIR.

By SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

It is, besides being a complete Guide-Book, the best description of the Fair yet given—poetic, beautiful, accurate. It describes the inauguration ceremonies, gives the director-general's address, the efforts to close the Fair Sundays and the triumph of the Sunday-openers; describes the various buildings and what they contain, and is, all in all, the very best picture of the Fair that can be painted with a pen.

ILLUSTRATED.

A MAP OF JACKSON PARK, enabling the visitor to make his way around, and the stay-at-home to see where he went.

A BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF THE FAIR, enabling one to comprehend at a glance the magnitude of the Exposition, the greatest ever known to the present time.

RELIGION A CURSE, RELIGION A DISEASE, RELIGION A LIE.

By Samuel P. Putnam.

Dedicated to the American Congress, of 1892, which for the sake of Religion, Stabbed Liberty to the Heart.

A work burning with indignation inspired by the Congressional act closing the World's Fair on Sunday—an act which practically united the government and the Christian church.

To which is added Mr. Putnam's address delivered before the Columbian Exposition Committee of the House of Representatives against Sunday closing.

Also the following Essays and Poems by Mr. Putnam, which have never before been put in book form: Orthodoxy; Freethought; Man, Not God (written for a Paine anniversary); The Statue of Liberty and Thomas Paine; a poem written for the opening exercises of the Silverton, Ore., Freethought Hall; Death and Life; The Golden Age; Shut the Door (a poem on the closing of the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia, in 1876).

The main essay in this work is one of the strongest arraignments ever made of the religion which cramps and fetters the minds of the people of this country. It should be distributed widely. It has been commended in the highest terms as it appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER and we hope every reader will buy a copy to lend his neighbor and arouse thought.

I HAV heard that the historic position of the young, relativly to the time in which they are placed, is in some sort falsified, unless they hav gone through a training in the current beliefs of their age; unless they hav undergone that, they miss, as it were, some of the normal antecedents. I do not think this plea will hold good. However desirable it may be that the young should know all sorts of erroneous beliefs and opinions as products of the past, it can hadly be in any degree desirable that they should take them for truths. If there were no other objection, there would be this, that the disturbances and waste of force involved in shaking off in their riper years the erroneous opinions which had been instilled into them in childhood, would more than counterbalance any advantages, whatever their precise nature may be, to be derived from having shared in their own proper persons the ungrounded notions of others.—John Morley.

DOWN the broad thoroughfares of the magnificent city, go many travelers, rich and poor. That magnificent building you see there is where its legislators meet; opposit, in that temple, they worship. Around the corner is its chamber of commerce. All three receive guests to-day—Pride, Envy, Ambition, Selfishness, Talent, Genius; all are welcome at its three courts—its legislativ halls, its temple of worship, its chamber of commerce. But see where comes a plainly appareled, sturdy, bright-eyed visitant. He knocks and presents his card; the city fathers show him the door; he goes to the church, but the pastor meets him going in, and says he must leave him at the church portals—such has always been his custom. The unwelcome guest goes sadly around to the chamber of commerce. The same men are now here who refused him admittance at the city hall and the temple of worship. They greet him cordially, and explain to him that he is always welcome at their councils, but that he must under no consideration present himself when they are making laws, or when they are at their devotions. They explain to him gently but firmly that he is good enough in his place, but there are two places which under no conditions he must enter. This has been their habit ever since they knew him at all. The name of the unwelcome guest is Common Sense.—Joseph Dana Miller, in Kate Field's Washington.

Miss Wixon has taken as her mottoes in writing this beautiful book of 292 pages—which she has dedicated to the memory of her father and mother—these sentences from the works of a great synthetic philosopher and a gifted liberal minister:

As with the physical, so with the ethical. A belief, as yet fitful and partial, is beginning to spread amongst men, that here, also, there is an indissoluble bond between cause and consequence, an inexorable destiny, a law which uttereth not.—Herbert Spencer.

Living is an Art, a method of expressing great conceptions; in fact, the highest method, the noblest of the Arts.—Thomas Starr King.

Pleasure and Progress.

AN ATTEMPT TO PROVE THAT

The Pursuit of Pleasure is the Sine Qua Non of Intellectual, Moral, and Social Development, and that The Promotion of Pleasure is the Duty of Philanthropy and Statesmanship.

By Albert M. Lorentz, LL.B.

CONTENTS:

BOOK I.—PLEASURE: Chap. I.—Sources of Pleasure. Chap. II.—Material Pleasures. Chap. III.—Ideal Pleasures. Chap IV.—Social Pleasures. Chap. V.—Pleasures of the Savage, the Barbarian and the Civilized. Chap. VI.—Genesis of religions. Chap. VII.—Christianity.

BOOK II.—INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT: Chap. I.—Purpose of life. Chap. II.—Material Pleasures. Chap. III.—Ideal Pleasures: Knowledge. Chap IV.—Ideal Pleasures: Reason. Chap.—V. Ideal Pleasures: Character. Chap. VI.—Social Pleasures. Chap. VII.—Pedagogical Despotism.

BOOK III.—MORAL DEVELOPMENT: Chap. I.—Morality. Chap. II.—Material Pleasures: Prudence. Chap. III.—Material Pleasures: Refinement. Chap. IV.—Ideal Pleasures: Foresight, Chap. V.—Ideal Pleasures: Civilization. Chap. VI.—Social Pleasures. Chap. VII.—Vice Caused by Restraint.

BOOK IV.—SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT: Chap. I.—Progress. Chap. II.—Protection, Capitalism, and Socialism: Respectivly an Actual, an Imminent, and a Proposed Violation of Individual Sovereignty. Chap. III.—Condition of Agriculture. Chap. IV. Public Schools, the Mene, Mene, Tekel of Socialism Chap. V.—Province of Government. Chap. VI.—Our Social Disorder.

Here are some of the verdicts on this remarkable production which have been rendered by men who are in every way qualified as judges of books:

This is a spirited, rattling sort of a book that skates right along over the deepest subject with out much thought whether the ice is thin or not. It answers the greatest question—What is the us, object motive, purpose, and summum bonum of life, and the real cause and motive of progress?—by one word, Pleasure!—Thaddeus B Wakeman.

He sharply attacks, also, modern methods of education, and in this he is most abundantly borne out by the facts, and his arraignment is practically unanswerable. His book is altogether a curious and suggestive one.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

The man who wrote this book knows how to write a book, and knows what he is writing about. There is not a padded sentence in the volume, not an attempt to fill up with words for lack of knowledge. The author deals hard blows at shams and falsehoods, and hard blows for realities and truth. We do not see how anyone can read this book and disagree with the leading propositions. The work is good; every chapter is worth reading. It is a work of common-sense Socialism. The chapter on public schools ought to be put into a tract and sent to every teacher in the land. Thousands of sentences are worthy of being framed as political maxims and hung up all over the nation. the book deserves a wide reading, not only for its literary style, which is clear and incisive, but for is bold, honest sayings.—L. K. Washburn.

After you read this book you will be as enthusiastic in praise of it as are the eloquent editor of the Investigator and the gallant President of the Canadian Secular Union,

Pleasure and Progress" has 398 pages, is splendidly printed from large, clear type, on excellent paper, and costs, bound in cloth, $1; paper covers, 50 cents.

The Creation of God.

By DR. JACOB HARTMANN.

An explanation of the origin of the God Idea, and the mental processes that led to the formation of idols and the worship of them. From the time of Terah's apostasy, Abraham's reformation and his banishment for heresy and blasphemy against the Chaldean idols, to Christ's coming, the principal characters are analyzed and shown to be human, by thought and deed. It is made plain that the peculiar phraseology, cant sayings, subterfuges, miracles, wonder-workings, and supernatural padding are the proper offspring of the then existing barbarism, ignorance, and superstition, constituting the peculiar politics of the day.

"If de wedder grows much wuss and de work harder all de time," said an Alabama colored man, "dis nigger will hav a call to preach."

"Do you beleebe in prayer, Uncle Jupe?" "I should think so; I allus pray dey may nebber cotch me stealing chickens, an' praise de Lord dey nebber hab yet."

Women who indulge in the prevailing fashion of dress sleeves are advised to open their Bible and read Ezekiel xiii, 8, which text says: "Woe to the women who sew pillows to all arm-holes."

"What did you learn at Sunday-school, Harry?" said his mother after his first visit to that institution. "Nothing." "Nothing? What did the teacher talk about?" "Only that they put dandelions in the lion's den and he wouldn't eat 'em."

Gentle Lady: "I hope you go to church sometimes." Good Boy: "Yes'm." Gentle Lady: "To what church?" Good Boy: "I used to be a Presbyterian, but I've been a Methodist since the last church fair. They put more strawberries in their shortcake."

Pipkin: "I should think you would be afraid to frequent a public gambling-room, with raids going on every night or two." Jack Potts: "Nonsense! there is no danger; if the police should come, the proprietor would tell them that it was simply a church fair."—Puck.

"Tommy," said the visitor, "hav you read your Sunday-school books?" "Some of 'm," he replied doubtfully. "Can you tell me what happened to the little boy that went fishing on Sunday?" "Yes. He caught three catfish and a neel." "How do you know that?" "'Cause I was him."

A Roman Catholic clergyman told me of a woman in Cork who was complaining to her priest of the misconduct of her son; that he was always fighting, gambling, and drinking, and often beat her when he was drunk. "Ah!" said the priest, "is he a Catholic at all?" "Begorra, your raverence," said she, "it's what he's too good a Catholic. If that boy had his will, he'd stick every Protestant from here to Tralee."—W. R. La Fanu.

There are some towns in Eastern Massachusetts, and not so far from the Hub, either, wherein card playing is one of the things you had better not do, if you are particularly concerned about public opinion. A certain gentleman and his wife who had settled in one of these towns and brought with them from Boston a love of whist, recently gave a whist party to some of their neighbors, who came as people doing something daring. A day or two later one of the older ladies of the village extorted from her daughter the confession that she had been at the whist party. "What do they do at whist parties?" she asked. "Why, they play cards," was the response. "That's what I'd heard," was the old lady's retort, "but I didn't believe it."—Boston Transcript.

The choir was singing a new arrangement of the beautiful anthem, "Consider the Lilies." The pure, sweet voice of the soprano rose clearly and distinctly in the solo:

"They toi-oi-oil not,
They toil not,
They toil not,
Ny-y-y-ther do they spin."

She paused, and the tenor took up the strain:

"Nee-ee-ee-ther do they spin.
They toi-oi-oi oil not,
They toil not,
They toil not,
Nee-ee-ee-ther do they spin."

The tenor ceased, and the basso, a solemn, red haired young man, with a somewhat worldly-looking eye and a voice like a foghorn, broke in:

"Nay-ay-ay-ayther do they spin.
They toi-oi-oi-oil not,
They toil not,
They toil not,
Nay-ay-ay-ayther do they spin."

Then the voices of the three were lifted up in semi chorus:

"Ny-y-y-ther
Nee-ee-ee-ther
Nay-ay-ay ther
do they spin.
They toi-oi-oi-oil not,
They toil not,
They toil not,
Ny-y-y-ther
Nee-ee-ee ther
Nay-ay ay-ther
do they spi.."

"Brethren," said the gray haired, old-fashioned pastor, when the choir had finished, "we will begin the service of the morning by singing the familiar hymn: 'And am I yet alive?'"—Chicago Tribune.

We believe that not only can good be done but money made by any Liberal who will canvass for our book "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated." In fact we know one man who worked at it but a few hours weekly and sold nearly fifty copies in a month. The price is low; everybody knows the Old Testament stories, and nearly everybody would like a book applying nineteenth-century wit and knowledge to them. People like to laugh. Reverence for the Old Testament tales has largely disappeared and jokes at the expense of Jonah and Joseph and Esau and Samson and David, and the other worthies of unsavory reputation, are keenly appreciated. It seems to us that the book will sell at sight. It does here in the store. Liberals out of employment will find this a good way to make an honest dollar.

THE HOLY CROSS SERIES.

The Popes and Their Doings. Biographical sketches of the most noted of these vicars of Christ and vicegerents of God, showing what they have done, and what kind of men they were. It contains very plain statements, in very unvarnished language, and the unmasking is complete, proving them to have been cruel, intriguing, and licentious men. Considering the rapid growth of Catholicism in this country, his book cannot be too widely disseminated. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents

The Awful Disclosures of Maria Monk, as exhibited in a narrative of her sufferings during her residence of five years as a novice, and two years as a black nun, in the Hotel Dieu nunnery, at Montreal. Perhaps not any anti-Catholic book published has created more excitement, and had such a circulation as this work. To counteract its effects the Catholics circulated a story that Maria Monk was "no better than she should be," but investigation disclosed that her "child of shame" was none other than the child of her priest-seducer. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth 75 cents.

Auricular Confession and Popish Nunneries. By Wm. Hogan, for twenty-five years a confessing priest. A revelation of the licentious practices of the priests and nuns in these religious brothels. There is no question that Ex priest Hogan knew the truth of the tales of vice, seduction, and infanticide he gives us; it is volume, and equally there is no question that if the people generally knew of them, Catholicism would not be given the vast amounts of money now allowed it by our various city governments. Price, paper, 50 cents, cloth 75 cents.

The Priest in Absolution. A Review of the system of auricular confession, including copious extracts from the "Confessional Unmasked," from the "Master Key to Popery," etc. The work is a protest against and an appeal to every American citizen to examine carefully and thoughtfully a religious system so invasive of privacy, so powerful for evil in licentious hands, so fraught with danger to female modesty, to the ingenuous openness of youth, and to the freedom of thought, speech and action. Price, paper, 25 cents.

OF
THE WRITINGS OF THOMAS PAINE.

COLLECTED, EDITED, AND CHRONOLOGICALLY ARRANGED

By MONCURE DANIEL CONWAY.

Author of "The Life of Thomas Paine," "Omitted Chapters of History Disclosed in the Life and Papers of Edmund Randolph," etc.

Four Volumes, Royal Octavo, Gilt Tops, Uniform with the Editor's "Life of Paine." Price per Volume, $2.50.

An edition of one hundred and fifty numbered copies bound in half leather, gilt tops, uniform with the limited editions of "The Writings of Washington," "The Writings of Jefferson," etc. Price, per volume, $4.

For the general reader the $3 edition of Paine's works is sufficient, as it contains all of his writings upon which his fame substantially rests. But for those who desire to go deeper into the subject of the man and polemic we can most unreservedly commend the "Life of Paine" by Mr Conway, and this edition of Paine's works edited by him It is the fullest that we are likely to have, and the student of history, and particularly the writer, should have it upon his shelves.

The work will consist of four volumes, and will be arranged chronologically. The cause of America, as Paine said, made him an author, and the first volume will cover the period of the American Revolution, beginning with the year 1774. It will therefore open with Paine's anti-slavery essay, and his philosophical or moral essays, while editing the Pennsylvania Magazine; these being followed by the great revolutionary, political, and controversial pamphlets which made such a profound impression on the country.

The second volume will consist mainly of the "Rights of Man," and pamphlets relating to English politics, but will also contain certain papers on French affairs.

The third and fourth volumes will consist mainly of Paine's religious writings, but will also contain some essays relating to American affairs, written in his last years. At the close will be given Paine's poems.

The first volume is now ready for delivery, and the others will follow soon. Orders for the whole set will be taken and filled as the volumes appear, or the volumes can be purchased separately. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER CO., 28 Lafayette Place, New York.

JUDGE THEODOCIUS BOTKIN of Kansas, made famous in the Sam Wood's case and notorious for his love of drink, has reformed and taken the rostrum for temperance.

IT appears that Emperor Francis Joseph will yield to the demand for the civil marriage law in Hungary and permit Premier Wekerle to reconstruct his cabinet along that line.

CITY-ATTORNEY HAMILTON of Milwaukee decides that Archbishop F. X. Katzer must pay taxes upon the archiepiscopal residence. The decision has caused a sensation.

BY a fire damp explosion 300 miners lost their lives in the coal mines of Count Larisch, at Karwin, Austrian Silesia, on June 14th. Ten of these composed a rescuing party.

THE Central Stock Yards and Transit Company's buildings in Jersey city were burned on June 16th. Loss, more than $1,000,000. Sheep to the number of 5,500 were consumed.

ERASTUS WIMAN, writer, orator, and financier, has been found guilty of forgery in the second degree in connection with his transactions as actual head of the Dun commercial agency.

THE Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia has finally decided that women lawyers may practice in that state. Belva Lockwood won the victory in a fight which has been pending for four years.

KOLB LEADER PEYTON G. BOWMAN shot and killed Jean Jeffers, a seventeen-year old boy, at Birmingham, Ala., on June 12. The shooting will probably hav a serious effect on political results.

THE Supreme Court of Nebraska decides that the eight-hour law of that state is unconstitutional, in that it discriminates against farm and domestic laborers and denies the constitutional right of contract.

LORD COLERIDGE, chief justice of England, died in London on June 14th. He was very fair in his treatment of G. W. Foote and the other English Freethinkers prosecuted for "blasphemy" ten years ago.

JUDGE CHARLES H. TRUAX, delegate in the New York Constitutional Convention, has proposed to suspend the law against lotteries so as to permit incorporated associations to promote art by the distribution of prizes.

COXEYITES are being imprisoned in various parts of the country for train stealing. At Los Angeles Judge Ross sentenced 170 for four months each. Three leaders were adjudged guilty of contempt by Judge Thomas at Leavenworth. We reported another wholesale conviction last week.

KANSAS Populists renominated Governor Lewelling by acclamation. The opposition could not agree upon a candidate. The convention, by a vote of 349 to 268, voted in favor of the proposed constitutional amendment giving the ballot to women. A resolution denouncing the A. P. A. was adopted without debate.

JUSTICE GAYNOR has added to the fame he achieved by his decision that vaccination is not compulsory by discharging a man arrested by a police captain who had no authority in the case. The Justice said: "There is no pretense of any criminal offense whatever. Some police officers do not seem to know that they hav no right to arrest except for crime. I don't know by what authority a police captain can make such an arrest. There are too many police captains arresting people without warrants. The idea of a police captain undertaking to determin what is private property! There is too much of that sort of thing going on. It wouldn't be tolerated in any country of the world except here."

Another "Sabbath" Scheme.

The sixty-fifth annual meeting of the synod of the Reformed Presbyterian church was held in Philadelphia on May 30th. Among the reports submitted was that of the committee "To Secure the Introduction of Literature on Sabbath Observance into School Books." Talk of church meddling with or control of secular affairs, but did anyone in the United States ever before hear of a proposition so outrageously audacious and insolent as that revealed by the name of this Covenanter committee? What wonder that such Protestants as these are opposed to the division of the public school funds in the interest of the Catholics! They want it all to serve their own purposes; they want to make the common schools, supported by the taxation of all classes of the people, the propagating grounds of their own narrow and intolerant notions. Of a piece with this demand is that of several Protestant lay organizations that only Protestant teachers shall be employed in the state schools. A Western newspaper mouthpiece of one of these sectarian societies, in declaiming against all teachers who are not Protestants, indignantly asks why Catholics should be allowed to teach in Protestant schools. Protestant, mind you, not public or common schools. It has come to this, that the schools of the people are held by one division of the church to be its property now, while the other division holds that they should be its private possession as soon as possible; and both agree in demanding that religion of some kind shall be taught therein all the time. All this in plain denial of the letter and spirit of the Constitution and of the law of equal freedom.

Rev. H. H. George, with whom our readers are well acquainted by reason of his persistent work in furtherance of the union of church and state, reported, as chairman of the before-mentioned committee, the progress so far made. Here is his report as condensed in the Christian Reformer:

"Dr. H. H. George · · · reported that he had corresponded with three leading school-book publishers; viz: Ginn & Co., Boston; Potter & Co., Philadelphia, and the American Book Company, New York. The first mentioned thought it a grand idea, and would like to hav the matter continued, and suggested that some sample manuscripts be prepared and submitted to the company. The second, or representativ of the Potter & Co. firm, could see no objection to it, and would be quite willing to consider it further. The American Book Company did not know that it would be expedient. They were aiming to meet any public demand in the line of school books, but had not known of any demand in the direction of Sabbath literature for such books. The committee deems it advisable to take further steps to prepare some discussion of the subject of the Sabbath in a graded series to suit the different school readers, and also a more analytic discussion of the subject for the text-book on physiology, and hav them submitted to these and other book firms."

Are Freethinkers willing and ready to pay for having their children vaccinated in the public schools with the poison of the Sunday superstition? Is not the religious party satisfied with what it already has? Manifestly not, and no student of history has for a moment supposed that it was. Every concession to the theocratic faction is a mistake, a serious and dangerous mistake. Would the teaching in the common schools of the Sunday notions of these people satisfy them? To ask the question is to answer it in the negativ. If that much of their creed goes into the text-books, why should not more go, and will not more go? There is no logical reason why, that part being admitted, other parts and all parts should not be admitted, and they would be admitted. If Congress, which is by the Constitution distinctly forbidden to make any law establishing religion, can pass laws intended to enforce and in fact enforcing recognition of religious dogmas, as it has done, cannot city, county, and state boards of education, which are not by the Constitution distinctly prohibited from establishing religion, adopt text-books and series of text-books which will, by intention and in effect, establish religion by teaching the pupils in the common schools and at public expense that certain religious dogmas are true and salutary? Most assuredly.

These Presbyterians should be heartily ashamed of themselvs. They demand so much that we wonder how they can hav the assurance to denounce the Catholics for asking for a division of the public school money. What the Catholic wishes who prefers this request is that, as Catholics help pay the taxes which support the schools, they shall be permitted to use a proportionate share of those taxes in the education of their own children. What the Covenanter wishes is that all the taxpayers shall contribute for the teaching of his creed in the common schools. In other words, the Catholic would be content, so he says, with the money he has himself paid into the school treasury, and with that he would educate his own children alone. The Covenanter, on the other hand, wants Jews, Freethinkers, Catholics, and outsiders to help him force Christian, and especially Presbyterian, notions down the throats of the children of Christians of other denominations, anti-Christians, and non-Christians. Many and powerful societies hav been formed for the purpose of antagonizing the Catholic demand (and Catholics on general principles); now it is to be seen whether those societies will protest and work against this latest scheme of the Protestant enemies of the secular republic.

But whatever they may do or leave undone, the course we should pursue cannot for a moment be in doubt. We must set our faces like flint against this attempt to make the public school room the missionary field of the Sunday law meddlers and persecutors. To this end the Freethought Letter-writing Corps will this week take Ginn & Company of Boston as their target. Let every old member and all the recruits possible show these makers of school books that the inculcation of theological concepts should never be attempted through the media of text-books of history and physiology and the interpretations and explanations of public school teachers. Write kindly but forcefully, logically, and in earnest.

Flag of God Above; Stars and Stripes Below.

Much is made by our American Protectiv Association friends of the fact that the Catholics hold allegiance to the church paramount to loyalty to the state. We hav thought that Protestants do the same, and that the various societies, more or less secret in their political methods, which are now doing the aggressiv work of Protestantism, are inimical to equal religious liberty. Almost every day we read something in their papers which confirms us in this opinion. The Omaha American of June 1st prints, under a display head, a sermon preached by Rev. A. T. Wolff, of Detroit, in the Calvary Presbyterian church of that city. Mr. Wolff had extended a special invitation "to the American Protectiv Association, the Orangemen, and kindred organizations" to come out and hear this sermon. In his opening sentences Mr. Wolff declared that he was himself a member of one of these organizations, which fact would seem to entitle him to stand equal with Rhadamanthus as a spokesman for them. Said Mr. Wolff:

"There is one safeguard. Place the white banner of the Lord at the top and underneath the flag of our country and keep them both waving in the free air."

Inasmuch as we are told that, as Freethinkers, our first duty is to our country, and that therefore we should giv aid and comfort to the "American" orders, we seem to be placed in a somewhat difficult position by Dr. Wolff. As Freethinkers and secularists we hav more or less disinclination to place "the white banner of the Lord" above the stars and stripes. But our Presbyterian friend has something more to say which is of interest to us:

"Among the pillars of this nation and the strongest of them all is the Bible. Our government was founded on the word of God, and in every department will be found in it all of our acts. It is even stamped on our dollars. By many witnesses this nation declares itself a religious nation, and yet it givs us no church and no Bible but the one universal Bible open before us. The Protestant church is the salt that preserves this nation, and God forbid that the time shall ever come when there shall be united with this government any taint of ecclesiastical power. The Protestant church offers to the state loyal subjects, and in turn the state offers to the nation loyal citizens. There are our free public schools, free from the taint of sectarianism in any respect. Let no sect ever lay its hand upon them, and let us forever maintain them in the original purity of years gone by with the American flag flying from the staff without and the non-sectarian Bible within."

We are compelled to say that the above is a very fair sample of the stuff we find in American Protectiv Association papers. By it we can quite accurately gauge the secularism of the order. Like the champions of the Christian amendment, Dr. Wolff is unalterably opposed to ecclesiastical meddling with government and talks of "our free public schools, free from the taint of sectarianism in any respect." Preceding and following these "glittering generalities" are specifications of some of the ways in which Protestant ecclesiasticism has already tainted our government and a solemn call to Protestants to maintain the schools with the Bible therein.

One of our correspondents avers that the trouble with the Catholic church is that she is a political power, that this is not a question of religion but of politics. On the other hand, a correspondent of the American, presumably equally well informed as to the matter at issue, says that primarily it is a religious struggle. This is a little of his reasoning:

"What Protestant Christian, if he be a true follower of Jesus, does not daily desire the establishment of the kingdom as he understands it, and by word and act and vote endeavor to further the cause he has at heart? These two, the Roman Catholic and the Protestant Christian, are both driving at the same thing as they understand it, but one is seeking to bring the world to the feet of its rightful king direct; the other is trying by word and act and vote to compel all to acknowledge the same king as he understands the matter as represented in the person of the pope; so we see it is at root a religious question, intensely so. The Roman Catholic in blind devotion to the pope and the Protestant Christian in intelligent devotion to the Son, both voting for their man."

It will be observed that it is declared that the Protestant is expected to aid in the establishment of the kingdom of Jesus as he understands it by "word and act and vote," and it is asserted that the Catholic is trying to do precisely the same thing. It is simply a bitter struggle between the Catholic and Protestant for supremacy, each aiming to establish the kingdom of Christ by word and act and vote, regardless of the religious and civil rights of the citizen. We are convinced that the American's correspondent's diagnosis of the disease is about right, and that our correspondent is "away off" in his guess.

The Danbury Dispatch, commenting around the letter of Dr. Knox which appeared recently in our news column, remarks that Thomas Paine "lived without hope of any future, and that contented him," etc. Turning to Paine's will, we read: "I believe in one God and no more, and I hope for happiness beyond this life."

Chilton's Sunday observance bill has passed its third reading in the Canadian Parliament. It is stated that the leaders of both parties hav given the bill assistance. The measure in question goes to the extent of interdicting the Sunday newspaper. It may be that Canadian Secularists hav chosen to work quietly against the priests' scheme, but if they hav not they are not working at all. Such inactivity would be very unwise and dangerous.

What a blessed and merciful thing is "Christian Civilization"! How superior to the product of the heresies of paganism! A trooper in South Africa sent home to the London Daily News a letter, of which this is a paragraph:

"We are at the present time occupied in setting fire to every nativ village we come across and shooting down the stray Matabele we see, and are still going onward in the hopes of finding old Lobengula. Every day we pick up assegais, shields, and the most beautiful nativ work, though we are unable to carry them on our saddles, so they hav to burn with the rest."

THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 7th will be a special number, containing a symposium on the pending Sunday bills, in which Representativs and Senators will participate, assisted by the Editor. The Sunday question is one of the momentous issues of the time and if reactionary Christianity triumphs here the most hopeful of us will hav just cause for apprehension bordering on despair. But we do not intend to be beaten and borne down by the Covenanter hordes. Sunday must be the people's day, not the priests'. THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 7th will cost seven cents per copy; five copies or more, five cents each. Order in advance.

The National Reform Association is trying to make mischief in the New York Constitutional Convention. Through delegate Benjamin S. Dean it presented to the Convention this overture for an amendment to the preamble of the Constitution:

"We, the people of the state of New York, grateful to Almighty God for our freedom, in order to secure its blessings, as a Christian people, in the name and by the authority of our Lord Jesus Christ, on whose shoulders is the government, do establish this constitution."

Mr. Dean, in presenting the petition, indorsed upon it his "distinct disapproval." We trust that the people of New York are of one mind with Mr. Dean.

The common council of Chicago recently passed a very sweeping Sunday closing ordinance. It shut all stores and shops up tightly, except the meat markets, which were allowed to remain open for a few hours in the morning during the summer months. Then the clerics rejoiced. But Mayor Hopkins interposed his veto, giving some very good reasons why such an ordinance should not become law. It may be that the Sabbatarian majority in the council can muster enough votes to pass the obnoxious measure over the mayor's veto; but whatever the final outcome, Mr. Hopkins deserves the thanks of all people who believe in minding their own business, and of all friends of the free Sunday.

"In this wonderful growth of English speech, we see the providence of God. As a language it is his chief vehicle for blessings to men. More of his name, his will, his law, and his love are to be found in the English than in any other, if not all other tongues, for in the tongue we speak there are more Bibles, more gospel sermons, and more beautiful songs than in all others combined."—Herald of Gospel Liberty.

From which we may infer that God is an Englishman, but all the more are we puzzled to know why he did not hav the Bible emitted in English in the first place. It may also be noted that the "Age of Reason," "Origin of Species," and all the works of Spencer and Huxley were written in this language of the "wonderful growth." Where is the "providence" in this fact?

The English House of Lords has again demonstrated the hopeless stupidity of religious law makers. As our readers know, it is a crime in England to marry a deceased wife's sister. Of course there is no reason whatever for such a ridiculous and contemptibly mean law, but that makes no difference to the fossils who stand in the way of its repeal. A few days ago a repeal bill was defeated in the Lords by a small majority. This majority was led by the Archbishop of Canterbury and Lord Salisbury and in it were included twenty bishops and the most of the Tory lords. Charles Blount, "the most chivalrous Freethinker of his age," fell a victim to this besotted superstition, killing himself in despair because he could not be united with Eliza Tyrell, who was a mother to her sister's orphaned child.

Geo. May Powell, of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, thinks that the theater forms the "bloody angle" in the battle for purity. Thousands, we are informed, spend so much in theater-going that when times of special financial pressure come it is easy for many of them "to pass into the ranks of shame and crime." But is not the same true of those who put their earnings from day to day on the dining-room table, and of the servant girls and other poor people who stint themselvs in order to help their church? The real animus of this sort of attack upon the theater is revealed by Geo. May Powell in this incautious sentence: "The theater is a deadly enemy to the church"; that is, because it is a rival of the church.

Miss Frances E. Willard returned from England the other day. Her friends gave her a reception at the Calvary Baptist church this city. The Times' report has this paragraph:

"The Rev. Phoebe Hannaford represented Sorosis. Mrs. Margaret Bottome was there for the King's Daughters; Mrs. Lillie Devereux Blake represented the Suffrage Association; Mrs. Clinton B. Fiske, the Woman's Home Missionary Society; and Wm. T. Wardwell, the Prohibition party. These and Anthony Comstock made addresses of welcome."

We stand for woman suffrage, on principle, but such an assemblage of suffragists does not fill us with a very lively desire for the "good time coming," when women will go to the polls led by Willard, Wardwell, Bottome, and Comstock.

Chicago Liberals need to be watchful and untiring. It is proposed to ask the board of education to introduce into the schools of that city a reading-book composed of selections from the Bible. Such a book is in use in Toronto. A petition in favor of this scheme now bears 60,000 signatures, it is said. Selections from all the literature of the ages need not be barred out of the schools, so long as they go in on their merits, and each part on an equality with all other parts. But those who are working to get a volume composed of Bible passages into the public schools hav no love for such an equality of authority. We are informed that the petition named represents "many religions," which means, of course, many branches of one religion—the Christian.

We should like to know where the conductors of high-school commencements get their authority for introducing baccalaureate sermons among the exercises on such occasions. That private religious schools do so is natural, but sermons certainly hav no proper place in any public school function. The Carson City (Mich.) Gazette givs an abstract of the sermon of Rev. A. D. Newton at the high school commencement in that town. His text was, "He that hath the Son hath life," and he claimed that in the equipment of the graduate belief in Christ was the noblest part. One thing which the reverend gentleman said seems to lack the flavor of unadulterated orthodoxy. He remarked that "life could not be defined nor its origin traced." What, then, becomes of the creation legend, without which the story of the "Son" has no meaning?

A late writer has said that it is the position of the law that "it is not permitted for one to break the law and plead in his defense that his actions were in the exercise of his religion and according to the dictates of his conscience. Laws are made to govern actions and not opinions. To allow one's opinions to govern would be to make the professed doctrins of religious beliefs superior to the laws of the land." But in governing actions laws inevitably govern opinions. Actions are the fruits of thoughts. We must be careful to discriminate between those laws which are intended to prevent trespass on equal rights and those which themselvs trespass. Laws to punish for the commission of murder represent the first class, while Sunday statutes are examples of the second. It is fallacious to argue, as is done, that the Adventists are not imprisoned because of their religious opinions, but because they hav violated the law. The laws which they transgress are in themselvs violativ of religious freedom, and hence the Adventists are punished for their heresies and not for any crime. The laws were enacted for that very purpose. The creedists get their dogmas into the statute books and then clamor for obedience to the "law." Persecutors in all ages hav been guilty of the same hypocrisy. It is time that we cease to be fooled by such shams.

Dr. C. W. Mak, of Denver, who calls himself a "Foodologist," that appellativ describing one who teaches that all curable diseases can be conquered by a proper diet, is a lecturer. On the evening of June 12th he was addressing an audience of one hundred and fifty in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, speaking "to men only." His lecture had been forbidden by the mayor, and two police captains and the chief compelled him to stop speaking. There is nothing in the newspaper reports showing the slightest cause for the arbitrary action of the authorities. However, the title of Dr. Mak's lecture is not especially felicitous; it expresses an assumed distinction between truths for men and truths for women, if it means anything legitimate. There is no such distinction, and the use of the phrase caters only to ignorance and its train.

"The faith of Protestants gives them the right and mission to judge of and contest the authority of their ministers. But for us, as sincere, consistent, and practical Catholics, it is otherwise, for the authority of our bishops and priests is divinely instituted. Our faith obliges us to be docil and submissiv to the authority of the church in all that concerns faith and conscience."—Pittsburg Catholic.

Therefore, is not the Covenanter Christian Statesman more nearly representativ of the Catholic than of the Protestant principle when it says that the church is the official interpreter and teacher of God's truth? But, on the other hand, what are the confessions of faith and the heresy trials of the Protestants but practical admissions of the soundness of the Catholic assumption that there must be an earthly authority to whose decisions all members of the church should bow?

Dr. Rylance, preaching a few weeks ago against woman suffrage, had occasion to refer to St. Paul, whom he did not seem to regard as a very helpful ally, for he said that that ancient woman-hater "could not foresee and provide for in his doctrin the modification which the evolution of humanity through the later ages would surely require in some things that he taught his disciples." What! St. Paul not inspired of God? The Bible contains error in relation to the position of one-half of the human race? And what does Dr. Rylance mean by referring to the doctrin which Paul preached as "his doctrin"? Did not Paul preach the gospel of Christ, and was not Christ the Son of God, who, as a part of God, existed from eternity! Is Paul, chief of the immediate disciples of the incarnate God, already a back-number authority, shoved out of leadership by that awfully scientific and hence blasphemous process, "the evolution of humanity"? What is to become of the church when her supposedly most orthodox divines thus incidentally and as a matter of course repudiate her fundamental tenets?

Comstock received a rebuke in the decision of Justice O'Brien that Joseph J. Little, receiver of the Worthington Company, may put on the market Fielding's "Tom Jones," the "Arabian Nights," Rousseau's "Confessions," "Rabelais," "The Decameron," and other classic works to which the ignorant censor of the Society for the Emolument of Hypocrits objects. But this zealous marplot is not satisfied; he declares that the works shall not be sold. He has not yet revealed how he is going to get around Justice O'Brien's ruling. Perhaps the unkindest, because the most truthful, thing lately said of Comstock is this, by the New York Times: "The fundamental fault with Mr. Comstock's judgments in matters of this kind is that while he undoubtedly knows obscenity, as such, when he sees it, he does not know literature." This hits the mark exactly. He knows obscenity instinctivly, but as to literature he cannot discriminate, because, to again quote the Times, "he lacks the intellectual basis of a proper judgment." This is what makes it so unfortunate that he holds the office he does and that there is such an office for him to hold.

Rev. Dr. E. D. Stoddard, of Jersey City, is not pleased with several things in this country, and one of them is our system of education. Its chief fault, in his eyes, appears to be that it does not teach enough religion. He says that "we [Protestants] create the Sunday school to do the work which we would naturally expect our public schools to do"; that is, inculcate religion. Why should we naturally expect the public school to do this work of the church and of religious parents? Does Dr. Stoddard believe in the union of church and state? Unless he does, how can he talk in this way? He wishes to know why Sunday schools are required, and he answers that it is because Christians are so divided that they "can't agree as to what should be taught" in the public schools. No one who thinks will deny this. We know that the only reason why we hav partial religious freedom is because no one religious sect is strong enough to impose its creed on the country. None of them of great numerical importance is opposed to religion in the schools, but each wants only its own there. Every step toward "church union" is fraught with danger to free institutions.

The Herald, in one of its peculiar Sunday editorial sermons, says that "religion supplies us with the incentivs which are necessary to the best quality of manhood. It takes our caprices and passions and recklessness and crude ambitions in hand, appeals first to the brain and then to the heart," etc. When has religion "appealed first to the brain" of man? Does the doctrin of hell appeal first to man's thinking faculties or to his fear of suffering? Does the picture of heaven arrest first the attention of the reasoning powers or of the emotions of marvelousness, cupidity, love of ease, etc., etc.? Has not the one insistent cry of the religionist been believe, believe, BELIEVE, BELIEVE? "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved," but we hav no promis for him who, because he thinks, finds it impossible to believe. How many millions of reams of sermons and disquisitions hav there been written whose burden was the vanity and carnality of reason? But once more the Herald:

"Say what you will, a belief in immortality is necessary to a thoroughly developed and symmetrical soul."

What kind of immortality? An immortality of agony or an immortality of rapture? The immortality of the Presbyterian or the immortality of the Universalist, of the orthodox Christian or of the orthodox Mohammedan?

The Christian Advocate has nearly a column of editorial comment on the Paine Memorial exercises at New Rochelle. It heads it, "Empty Pageant at an Empty Grave." Compelled to admit that "Thomas Paine deserves high honor for his political services," Dr. Buckley is yet shocked by what he terms the reckless use of hyperbole by Colonel Ingersoll, especially when that gentleman claims that Paine "did more to establish the republic than any other man then standing on the soil." To one who has carefully read Conway's life of Paine and the testimony of the great democrat's contemporaries, the sweeping claim of Colonel Ingersoll does not appear very extravagant, and had Dr. Buckley carefully examined the number of THE TRUTH SEEKER which immediately preceded the issue from which he obtained his information about the celebration he would hav found plenty of evidence going to show that Paine was the mightiest figure of the Revolution, measured by the influence he exerted. The Christian Advocate says that it is not sorry to see Paine's patriotic services recognized, and it declares that they "always were" recognized "by the people of this country." This is preposterously untrue. So deeply had the clergy covered the name of Paine with derision and obloquy because he wrote the "Age of Reason," that twenty years ago not one American citizen out of fifty knew that he did anything in the Revolution. Only a few of our late historians hav dared mention him, and even to-day the Fourth of July orator who links his name with those of his distinguished compeers is as rare as he is independent. How many of our school histories, enumerating the names of the heroes who made the republic possible, tell the pupils a thing about the author of "Common Sense" and "The Crisis"? It is amusing to note that several Christian critics who hav referred to the exercises at New Rochelle hav ventured the opinion that while Paine "has a sure place in history," his Infidel eulogists are doomed to oblivion. This is no doubt true of many of them, though not of all; but it is comforting to reflect that it is no less true of ninety-nine out of each one hundred of his Christian detractors, of both the past and present.

People who are afraid to openly advocate laws in the interest of religion, but who wish to hav such laws enacted, are wont to say that they demand Sunday statutes in the interest of rest. Sometimes this pretense is exposed quite unintentionally by the pious masqueraders themselvs, and the effect is provocativ of derisiv smiles. The Independent has this in one of its special columns:

"The mayor of Savannah, Ga., has put himself upon record as opposed to Sunday baseball. A league game was advertised for a recent Sunday. Every arrangement was made for big crowds, and the managers were looking forward to a brilliant financial success. The chief of police served notice on the clubs that they would both be arrested if a single ball should be thrown, and the result was the return of a large number of people disgusted."

If this act of the mayor and chief of police of Savannah was in the nature of a hygienic or sanitary regulation of the conduct of the ball players and spectators, why did the Independent put the item under the department head of "Religious Notes"? If sanitation and hygiene are really religious in nature and effect, why does the Independent place most of its notes concerning health under the department title of "Sanitary," reserving only those relating to enforced Sunday rest for its "Religious Notes" column? We hope our neighbor will explain this.

The Christian Statesman has had its feelings badly hurt because "the highest courts of most of the great Christian bodies of the country" lately in session did not publish to the world in thunder tones the "truth" that this nation is now withering under the frowns of an angry God. This is too rich to escape quotation in THE TRUTH SEEKER:

"It would hav taken but a moment's consideration to bring the conviction that God is visiting the land in chastisement for its abounding iniquities, and that the only way of deliverance from these national trials and dangers is that of national repentance. This is the plain teaching of God's word. Ought not these deliberativ bodies, by clear and distinct deliverances, to hav pointed out these facts to the nation, and urged the people whom they represented to humiliation and prayer? And especially, ought they not to hav joined in an earnest request to the chief executiv of the nation, to appoint a day for national humiliation, confession of sins and prayer for forgivness? This has been done in other times of national distress. The condition of things calls loudly for it at the present time. There is abundant reason for the divine displeasure against the nation. And there can be no reasonable doubt in the minds of those who represent the church of God, that the present distress is a manifestation of that displeasure. The duty of the hour, therefore, is national confession, repentance, and prayer. And the church, which is the official interpreter and teacher of God's will to men, ought to remind the national executiv of this duty, and ask for a call to confession and prayer. That such action was not taken by the late assemblies seems a strange omission indeed. Is it possible that the churches themselvs are turning away from our historic loyalty to God?"

We hav a suspicion that many of the members of these Christian assemblies are at heart very much ashamed of the prayer superstition, and especially of that form of it to which the Christian Statesman is so devoted. This may explain, in part at least, the omission which grieves our theocratic editor. It will be noted that it is claimed that the church is the "official interpreter and teacher of God's will to man." Which church, and where are her credentials? By what authority does any church get between man and his God, admitting that he has a God? Does this claim of the Protestant editor differ essentially from that put forth by the Catholic Pope? And these are the absurd theories which the nation is asked to make a part of its organic law by the adoption of the Christian amendment!

Communications.

Now, Mr. Peck!

MR. JOHN PECK—Dear Sir: You evidently hav read my articles in criticism of Mr. Wettstein, and think you are called upon to ask such questions as seem pertinent to the subject and at the same time quite unanswerable. You very innocently place yourself in the position of an honest and earnest investigator of Spiritualism, and place me in the unenviable attitude of one who is a know-all, or as one who is positiv and pretends to know all about it, and after assuming these relations you ply me with such questions as you think should utterly squelch my arrogance, and appall me with the magnitude of your interrogatories.

You say you "never hav had an opportunity to investigate Spiritualism," and yet you are a man, as I judge, past sixty, and hav therefore been an observer of the agitation of the subject the last forty-five years, for you say that you hav read a great deal about it. I judge, therefore, that any defect in your knowledge upon this most worthy of all subjects must be owing to some deep-seated prejudice, or must be owing to a disinclination to face the ridicule which the unthinking fools of society, and its mountebanks, and the theological bigots of the age, hav enshrouded it with.

Now, sir, while you take the position of an inquiring pupil, and set yourself down meekly at my feet, as a child might before a master, you at the same time hav the assurance to assert that to your mind, and from all which you hav read, by exercising your reason and judgment, "spirits are as impossible as gods, ghosts, devils, and witches," and then you go on about the stories of Jonah and the whale, and Samson and the foxes," and such like, and insist as they outrage science so must a belief in spirits. This shows that you are not the desirous, innocent, childlike inquirer that you pretend, but that you set out with a determined idea to show me what a big fool I am to entertain a belief founded on such facts as you deny, and which I cannot answer. You go in precisely the same style with your questions, and almost repeat what Wettstein had asked a dozen times in his onslaughts against Spiritualism, and which I thought I had answered. You say: "Will you tell me how it is possible for a mind to exist without a physical body and a nerve system?" "How is it possible for a brainless skull to think?" "How a dead eye can see?" "How one can feel when there is no nerve to convey the sense to the brain—where there is no sense of feeling, tasting, smelling, seeing, and hearing?" Then you put an answer into my mouth, and say, "But you will say there is a soul, a spirit, or a something which passes out of a man at death which can exercise these functions."

I hav placed your questions all in a batch, because they all belong to the same general misapprehension of what Spiritualists believe, and what the spirits teach, and if the fundamental objection of your questions is removed, it should settle those ideas about something which Materialists do not know, and cannot seem to understand, and for that reason, having no other stock in trade, they keep offering them as unanswerable arguments against Spiritualism.

My answer, then, is this: In nature, or in all matter, there is a life element, which is the moving force of matter; or, in other words, matter and the life of matter constitute all there is in existence. They never were created, but hav always existed; they are co-related and are and hav always been coexistent. Hence there is no such thing as absolutely dead matter. No matter how low a place in the scale of existence a given quantity of matter is made to assume, it still has life. This the chemistry of nature demonstrates, and the very fact that the action of chemistry can and does take place in and through all forms of matter makes this a self-evident proposition. Hence death is only partial—a mere change from one form and condition to another. The spirit, or mind, and structure of the spirit body, which was composed in the natural body, on passing out of the natural body at death does not therefore become bodiless, but is made up of the same nerve substance which it had while in the natural body before death; therefore the spirit has all the faculties and bodily parts and substances, coupled with the life or soul element which it enjoyed before the change. Spiritualists do not teach that a spirit can walk without limbs, speak without organs of speech, see without eyes, hear without ears, think without a head, and the like nonsense, which Materialists assume they must; but they do say that all the natural parts hav become refined in the processes of life and are, while still substance, a much more refined material than ordinary matter, which becomes a spirit body. The Materialist objects to this because he cannot see this spirit body, etc., but he forgets that he never saw any man's mind, he never saw his own nervous fluid. The nerve force, of which my friend Peck talks so much and acknowledges to be so necessary to the faculties of seeing, tasting, smelling, hearing, and feeling. he never saw, and the most powerful microscope would not aid him in seeing it; therefore there is absolutely no reason in objecting to its existence on any such grounds and, logically, they amount to nothing.

It appears, therefore, that the life element which quickens all matter and pushes it into organic form and existence is a universal, eternal, and inexhaustible force associated with all forms of material nature. Aside from this there appear to be some sixty to seventy different forms of elemental substances, and it seems that from the union and relation of most of these, by and through the evolutions of matter through countless ages, has animal life at last became a fixed fact on this planet. This much we in part know from the facts of science and the observations of nature. But as to the existence of any future life for the spirit of man, who stands as the highest product of nature's handiwork, we must open the eyes of our understanding and listen hard and look deeply into the occult forces about us; and before looking at phenomena, on which Spiritualism expects to establish the existence of this refined material body, with all its parts and faculties, I will just say to my friend Peck that no Spiritualist who understands himself will for a moment contend that a spirit body has no substance, but that it is, on the contrary, the finest of materiality, and that when the substantial parts are even entirely eliminated or dissipated, the soul, or life element, would hav to attach itself to something akin to the universal life or such a state could simply never come. It is my belief that the soul, or mind, and all that it embraces, will ever be related to some bodily form and organization; hence the soul's immortality and its individuality, as in contradistinction to the nirvana of the Orientals.

The modern developments of Spiritualism, which occurred about forty-three years ago in New York state, began by certain mysterious sounds and raps, and by a mere apparent coincidence or guess the sounds were interrogated and requested to rap a certain number of times. That little incident led to the stupendous fact that those sounds had associated with them an intelligence, and not knowing what else to call this intelligence the little girl called it "Old Split-foot," and this idea the church has kept up diligently ever since, for, having failed to stop the rapping spirits, and knowing them to be intelligences, they very cunningly declared it to be the devil and so hav the same old monster to fight that seduced Mother Eve in the garden. It is the best argument the church bigots could adduce and the one best calculated to frighten their adherents from the subject. In this they are quite consistent, for, knowing that these phenomena do indicate an intelligent producing cause, which any church member must perceive, their best hold on the fears of their members is to cry out, "Devil!" and so frighten the sheep into the fold; but how a Materialist, who can reason and does not believe in devils, can see, hear, and feel these occurrences and know them to be an intelligent force, and yet deny the fact of a spirit life, is beyond my comprehension. It must be simply because they will not go to work patiently and investigate, but are like Mr. Peck, who has lived right within the atmosphere of the subject and has failed to get any light from it in forty-five years.

If Mr. Peck will go to a rapping medium and set aside the idea of, Why go to a medium? and open his eyes and ears, and try to get some truth, I hav not the least doubt he will see something to study and profit by. If he wants to begin at the bottom, let him take a pocketful of corn, and not knowing now many grains he places therein, see if the spirits can tell how many grains the pocket contains. If the medium is what is called a physical medium, let him observe that tables, chairs, and other materials are moved about intelligently in broad daylight and without any human contact. He may, to vary the experiments, go to a slate writing and test medium, and hav some slates written upon without even a pencil, as I hav often had done, and without the medium having even touched the slates. I hav had this happen when the medium was not within two feet of the table upon which the slates were laid, and in every such case I got plain, common-sense facts, and sometimes as many as a dozen tests in a single slate writing.

Last month I attended a materializing seance, and while a gentleman stepped behind the curtains (which were placed loosely across the corner of a solid wall), and held the hands of the medium, a spirit came out, or rather formed immediately on the outside of this curtain, and was plainly seen by about twenty persons to walk about the floor.

Again, while the medium was sitting outside of the curtain, no less than two and on one occasion three spirits opened the curtains and showed themselvs and moved about the space, also on one occasion came out and lectured us for five minutes.

I hav many slate writings and pictures made by various colored crayons and paints, while the slates were bound tightly together, and held by myself. In fact, they never left my hands at all. In one case I carried two slates about three hundred miles or more to a medium, and got a most beautiful and convincing test from my departed son, through a medium whom I had never before seen. And without making this letter too long and tedious I will say that for the last forty years I hav witnessed all manner of manifestations, from simple rapping to the movement of sofas holding several hundreds of pounds of human flesh, and the movement of tables and chairs without human contact. I hav seen hands and fingers made, faces and heads only, also full forms materialize whom I hav recognized both by appearance and from their conversation and relation to facts with which I am acquainted. I hav had pictures precipitated upon canvas, and it was done in from one to five minutes, which no artist could hav done in several hours' labor, and hav seen it done by a committee of skeptics who had all the management of the experiment, and a thousand others which I do not care to enumerate, and not the most learned Materialist or skeptic has been able to explain or set aside the evidence to this day. I hav also in a few cases discovered some trickery and sometimes I hav been compelled to lay the trickery to a class of low spirits who delight in such work, and who generally accompany to seances persons who are stubborn and appear unusually smart in their own conceit, for some persons are so constituted that it is very hard for them to ever get any evidence of the glorious truths of a future life; and they are doomed by their own inherent skepticism to go out of this life into an almost impenetrable darkness for a time at least.

The reason I hav for knowing that these manifestations are what they claim to be is the mind, thought, or intelligence they manifest. If any phenomena, such as electricity sometimes manifests, or as seen in the forces of nature that merely obey the law of chemical forces, and which do not manifest any special intelligence, occur, I do not associate that with spirits, but when I see an intelligence which corresponds to my mind and addresses itself to some corresponding facts of which I am cognizant, that I call a spiritual manifestation and coming from a spirit, and I defy all the sophists to ascribe it to anything else.

The arguments of skeptics are usually very flat. To a man who has had the experience the idea of electricity, magnetism, hypnotism, hallucination, deception, and fraud, including gullibility and self-psychology, are no arguments and do not meet the facts nor the truths of these phenomena; and it is absolutely useless to waste time in arguing with a man who has steeled his mind with double armor plates which cannot be penetrated with reason nor facts. It is too much like a man who has pulled down the blinds of his windows and drawn tightly the inside curtains and then stands there praying for the light of the glorious sun.

I will answer one more thing that at first blush seems impossible and improbable to Mr. Peck. He wants to know when Indians appear in full uniform, with bows, arrows, etc., "whether they come first in a nude form, and whether these beads, bones, feathers, bows, etc., are real, and when they dematerialize, where do they go to?" Now, I will say that there is not a material in existence that is not contained in our atmosphere. All the elements of matter go there. When we burn coal the carbon goes into the air; when we burn bones the elements of bone—lime, potash, soda, and in a word everything else that is changed from the visible to the invisible state—go there and are not lost. It is, therefore, no more wonderful that an Indian should materialize his clothing and trinkets than that he should materialize his body, for the reason that he holds them only as a temporary thing and when he ceases to exert his mind and will upon them they immediately disintegrate. I do not know how this is done, because I am not familiar with the laws of spiritual chemistry; but I do know that it is done, and I know that sometimes material things are used which remain. I hav seen flowers, live fish, etc., that were brought into the circle, and the fish lived and were preserved in water for a long time. These were simply taken from some place and carried to the circle, and you know it must hav been done in a hurry, for they would liv but a few minutes out of water. In like manner diamonds, etc., may be had. I hav seen lace and other materials made by the yard. One man whom I knew had a piece given to him; at first it was several inches long, but every time he opened it to the daylight he found it growing less, and it finally dissolved. This, then, shows the difference between real objects and those which are materialized only for the occasion.

In regard to knowing whether a table was simply electrified by some mechanical agency, and electricity made to dance it about, or whether it was done by spirits, must be determined by the intelligence it gave you, and your knowledge of the fact that it was not operated by some contrivance, a very simple thing to determin. I place all my dependence on the fact of intelligence, and on this evidence I cannot be led astray. Electricity may be generated by spirits or mortals, when the necessary friction of particles is had; but no amount of friction will generate intelligence, unless the man or the spirit is behind the phenomena.

If the air contains all the elements of matter in a refined state, or in the form of gases, and if chemistry can solidify almost every one of them, even that of oxygen, why should not a spirit that livs in those elements be able to do as much with them as chemists are now doing with them? Can you tell? And if I can establish the fact of the existence of spirits by the intelligence they convey to me, it seems that all your objections formulated in the article referred to are answered and fully set aside.

Your material scales and measures are too gross to weigh and measure the spirit by; only your judgment, reason, and knowledge of the facts and an observation of the phenomena, can aid you in the acquisition of the greatest truth yet revealed to thinking man.

It requires a far-seeing, clear-thinking, deep-reasoning man to understand Spiritualism, and I think no man has yet pretended to explain all he has seen; yet any common, honest, plain individual may be fully convinced of the facts and evidences which they bring, and which all the sophistry and ignorant doubts of the professedly educated cannot rob him of, and which he is just as competent to understand for himself as the most learned scientist.

Freethinking Judges.

THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 29, 1883, printed a letter signed "Antichrist," which ended as follows:

The "Man of Sin" is happy to learn from a reliable source that Judge Bradley is a Freethinker; and further, that all the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, except Mr. Justice Strong, are Infidels. In other words, on the question of the divine origin of Christianity, the court stands eight to one.

The statement was widely copied, and the Christian at Work, Dr. Talmage's paper, undertook to controvert the allegation by informing its readers that Chief Justice Waite is an Episcopalian, Justice Field is a true blue Presbyterian, Justice Bradley is an elder in the Reformed [Dutch] Church, Justice Gray is a Channing Unitarian, and Justice Blatchford is a through-and-through Episcopalian. We are not advised as to the remaining five [four], but we believe there is not an Infidel on the United States Supreme bench.

In reply to this counter allegation, a correspondent of the New York Sun wrote thus:

I read in your paper of Tuesday an article giving the religious status of the judges of the United States Supreme Court. I presume the article is correct—at least it should be, coming from the source it does [The Christian at Work]. Aliunde Joe is put down as an elder in the Reformed church. Great Scott! You ought to hear him cuss once when in a passion. The individual who carted a load of apples up a steep hill wasn't a marker for Joe.

Shortly after that Chief Justice Waite (Episcopalian) went to Coney Island with Lord Chief Justice Coleridge, on the Christian Sabbath, where they dined on the piazza to the music of Gilmore's band. "This example," said the Christian Intelligencer, "will fill God-fearing hearts with sorrow."

Meantime the "Man of Sin" learned on inquiry that another of the Christian judges would swear like a trooper. The fact was that "Antichrist" was slightly in error, but only in regard to time. His informant is still living, and he says that while Justice Strong was on the bench Justice Bradley told him that all the judges, except Strong, were Freethinkers. Justice Strong retired nearly two years before "Antichrist" made the statement; and other changes had occurred, by which Blatchford (Episcopalian) and Gray (Channing Unitarian) were seated.

If church membership alone is proof of one's religious status, then be it known that the "Man of Sin" is a Presbyterian and his informant is a Baptist. One was sprinkled and the other ducked.

ANTICHRIST.

Observations.

When Miss Susan H. Wixon, in her argument for woman suffrage, says that "what women would or would not do with the ballot is not to be considered in discussing a question of right," she givs the G string of a great principle a loud and resounding twang. Numerous years ago, and I think it was in the course of a little discussion in which Miss Wixon herself had something to say, I put forth the same note. I had heard nothing of it since, and had begun to think it was the lost chord. The principle is a good one to work with in considering all sorts of questions involving liberty and equality—such, for example, as Freethought, financial reform, immigration, prohibition, the social question, and free trade. For always in thine eyes, O Liberty, shines that high light whereby the world is saved; and though thou slay us we will trust in thee. It may be and frequently is said that giving women the ballot is like investing a small child with a hammer and a mirror; but that objection is not fatal. My respected mother-in-law, who was noted for her disrespect for adages that seemed to hav no foundation in experience, was in the habit of giving her children those very utensils for play-things. The looking-glass got broken by some one stepping on it, but the hammer had nothing to do with that result.

It does not follow, though, that because Liberals favor woman suffrage, they hav any business to make it a part of their Freethought platform. The object of the Liberal organization is to secure the secularization of the state. Why, then, should it advocate a measure sure to delay and almost certain to defeat the accomplishment of that purpose? Having resolved that we believe in the total separation of church and state, it would be quite improper, as I view it, to further resolve that as the women of this country oppose that measure, we therefore, in order to prevent the furtherance of our object, demand that said women be empowered to vote against us. Thomas Paine pointed out the unwisdom of giving power to persons who do not know how to use it, and contended that if France had had a constitution before she had a revolution, the atrocities of the latter would hav been averted. Likewise with the Nine Demands secured by perfecting our Constitution, the dangers of unrestricted suffrage would be less threatening. I think that women who believe in the equality of the sexes ought to work first for the rights of man through the realization of the Demands of Liberalism. After the fences are up, those who cannot distinguish between a right and a rite may with greater safety be turned loose.

Two weeks ago I inserted in this column the first three stanzas of Prof. J. H. Cook's poetical tribute to S. P. Putnam. The lines then printed told how old Israel Putnam (by Professor Cook termed a namesake, but in reality an ancestor of Samuel), hearing the firing at Lexington, unyoked his team, turned the cattle out to pasture, and "snatched his gun." In what now follows, the measure changes, but the story goes uninterruptedly on:

4. "There strides bold Putnam, and from all the plains
Calls the third host, the tardy rear sustains;
And mid the whizzing deaths that fill the air,
Waves back his sword and dares the following war."

That sounds like Homer celebrating the siege of Troy, but Professor Cook is soon himself again. He says:

5. So S. P. Putnam, warrior bold,
With swelling bosom I behold,
Fighting our foes on every hand,
That freedom, justice, right may stand.

6. His ready tongue, inspiring pen,
Can stir the brains and hearts of men;
In cities or on the frontier
He strikes for freedom and men hear.

If I were not a carping critic I should think only of applauding sentiments like these; but being irretrievably such I must point out that people strike to be felt, while, for the purpose of being heard, speech has superior advantages. Striking so that men hear suggests the use of a paddle or something else that possesses an audible impact. In the days of chivalry, when warlike persons encased themselvs in armor, we can readily understand that a stranger hearing but not seeing a combat would imagin himself in the vicinity of a tinshop; but times hav changed and even poets must adapt their forms of expression to the mechanical improvements in fighting gear. Putnam speaks for freedom and men hear. There are three more stanzas of Professor Cook's poem to come.

Now the Brooklyn board of education has resolved on introducing military training in the public schools of that city. According to the program, every boy over ten years of age is to be enrolled—companies of 100 each organized—the tactics and regulations of the United States regular army adopted—regular instructors in military science employed—and the whole schoolboy army to be made subject to regularly-appointed drill inspectors. The fautors of the movement giv various and curious reasons why the boys should be drilled. One patriot who survived the late unpleasantness stated it as a historical fact that nations invariably get involved in war every thirty years, and we are approaching the end of our thirty years of peace. Hence, he said, the necessity of organizing an army; besides, the drill would make the boys straight. Another patriot said that Bull Run was lost because the boys of the North were not organized. The drill made the boys straight. A third patriot, while denying that he was a pessimist, said that the labor disturbances necessitated a standing army, and standing in the army would make the boys straight. So it was resolved to begin military operations at once, providing, which is an important item, that an appropriation could be secured.

What these gentlemen say about the prospect of a war before 1896 may be founded on fact, but they are manufacturing the facts themselvs. Of course if we wanted a whole lot of prizefights in the meantime, we would get slugging teachers for all our schools; and military drilling ought to hav the same result as regards war. The American citizen has to get used to all sorts of strange things. For example, the police arrest citizens for carrying guns, and the government arms the school boys. They arrest people for working on Sunday, and the people, finding other places closed, go to church, where they detect the minister earning his salary by the sweat of his jaw. Gambling is suppressed by law, but the men who make the laws are the heaviest gamblers and the leading all-round sports of the community.

I suspect that in view of the dangers that menace our school-children the girls will soon be arming and drilling and taught to look under the bed with military precision every night before retiring. As the patriots hav said about the boys, it helps to keep them "straight."

My previous remarks about military affairs hav elicited this:

MILITARY RANK AND FLAPDOODLE.

I see you persist in giving me a military title, despite my assurance that I was never anything more than a fifer, and quit the service before I reached my majority. But I suppose I may as well accept the title; so I'll sign myself "Kernel," which you know is phonetic.

It is true that for some twenty years I hav called some sorts of writing "flapdoodle;" for example, Editor Dana's discourses on religion. But I didn't coin the word.

Madame Blavatsky used it also. In a letter to me in 1877 she called Renan "a flapdoodle." It wasn't quite grammatical and I told her so. She was an apt scholar, and when her ghost appeared to Professor Coues (pronounced Kowz), the pseudo-Theosophist, saying "Elliott Coues, I hate you, I hate you," and he bantered her on her snub-nose and occult wisdom, she (i.e. the ghost) got mad at the banterer and cried out (through the medium), "It's all damned flapdoodle."

KERNEL BURR.

I can throw no light on the subject of Mr. Burr's title. I think T. C. Leland called him colonel occasionally. Leland said as far South as Washington, though, the phonetic spelling of it was Kuhnel. But military titles are depreciating in value nowadays. They began to go down when the Salvation Army came up. Then Coxey gave them another slump, and if the martial movement keeps on amongst the school children, the citizen who has blown a fife in an ununiformed band will easily outrank a brigadier-general on wheels.

P.S.—Bearing in mind all that Madam Blavatsky knew about Mahatmas and the occult, even her ghost should hav been an authority on flapdoodle.

The Freethought Letter-Writing Corps is not the only body whose members are employing the postoffice for purposes of public and private enlightenment. There seems to be a Free Banking Corps of excellent marksmen for whom I have achieved the glory of becoming a target. I don't see why they choose me instead of firing at Mr. E. O. Roscoe, but I expect they know easy game when they see it, or perchance none of the members had his gun with him when Roscoe was about. It often happens that way.

I judge that what these gentlemen are trying to teach so dull a scholar as myself is that government monopoly of coining or otherwise making money is unjust; that interest beyond the cost of putting money in circulation is a burden to trade; that so far as government has any rightful business with handling gold and silver, it is only to stamp the weight and fineness on those metals, while commerce will see that they pass at their true worth

Mr. J. K. Ingalls, of Glenora, N. Y., contends that if our lawmakers would let the currency alone commerce would find its medium of exchange as it does its wagons and other implements for distribution of products. Under which system, I should conclude, the people who want silver for money would coin the output of their mines, and banks desirous of issuing a circulating medium on the strength of their assets and securities would proceed to do so. But here a question arises, to wit, what would become of the leadpipe cinch by which capital now constricts the granger and smaller merchant? If the Western states, for example, were allowed to capitalize their wealth, relieved of the prohibitiv tax of ten per cent on state banks, the financier could no longer hold his job. I believe there are a lot of gentlemen calling themselvs "centers of trade" and holding the credit and honor and morals of the country next to their pockets, who assert that our national virtue should be bartered only for gold. As a general thing they hav most of the gold and none of the virtue, which places them in a position to dictate when virtue is thrown on the market. Can they be induced to let go? Owing to the greed which either the possession of wealth or the lack of it seems to create in the human mind, I hardly see where the advocates of so just a system as free banking would look for their constituency.

The Irish police officers who hav made New York a regular Swatem and Begorrah hav been properly racked by the Lexow Senate committee; and, by a sort of piratical justice, their chief inquisitor, Lawyer Goff, is one of their own countrymen. All of which is in fulfillment of the prophecy that whenever one Irishman is to be roasted another Irishman can be found to turn the spit. The adjournment of this Lexow committee without completing its business is altogether disappointing. The investigators had almost reached the door of Tammany hall, which, along the trail they were following, is but a few steps from Archbishop Corrigan's palace —the headquarters of the church of Rome in New York.

The last regular lecture of the season was delivered before the Manhattan Liberal Club last Friday evening by Edward W. G. Dobson, Esq., his subject being "Spontaneous Generation." Mr. Dobson is THE TRUTH SEEKER's office boy, and he has provided this paper with a notice of his address. The notice appears under the head of "Lectures and Meetings," and assures the reader that the discourse was able and interesting. Some of the auditors who contrasted the size of the speaker with the magnitude of his theme were moved to ask themselvs whether the present generation is not almost too spontaneous for healthy development. The closing exercises of the club this week Friday will be great. Aside from the discussion on what the Constitutional Convention ought to do, Dr. Ned Foote has arranged a unique and original program that promises to be simply out of sight. Dr. Ned himself will be the bright particular comet of the occasion.

In the regular course of events the duchess of York, England, is as well as could be expected. The youngster is a boy, and differs from other male infants mainly in the fact that being heir to a throne he cannot expect to be president. He is born elected and will hav no campaign expenses and biography. I call attention to this little shaver on account of the queer doings that attend the approach and appearance of one of his class. Everybody knows for a considerable period beforehand that either himself or his sister will call upon his parents on or about a certain date. When his mother feels that his visit should not be longer deferred and makes announcement to that effect, the proceedings are most extraordinary. The men folks are not rushed out of the house, as with us. On the contrary, several salaried functionaries, state and ecclesiastical, are at once sent for. The family doctor, of course, is there, while with him, in the royal bed-chamber, are the home secretary, the lord chancellor, and the archbishop of Canterbury. This seems incredible and a trifle barbarous, but it is said to be true and also English. From first to last these fellows stand around, like men waiting for a train, that they may verify and record the birth and sex of the infant, a precaution taken in accordance with custom in order to avoid mistakes as to parentage, and it is said to work satisfactorily so far as the maternity is concerned; but there hav been occasions in the past when the committee must hav felt that they were a springtime, summer, and autumn too late to further depose.

In discussing the proposed constitutional amendment forbidding appropriations of public money for the support of sectarian charitable institutions, the Roman Catholics, the parties chiefly interested, are offering a practicable objection to the measure. They say that if the appropriations are stopped, the institutions "will hav to turn some of their inmates adrift." That is true, and it shows the evil that has grown out of the bad habit of encouraging sectarian asylums with state gifts. Protestant and Catholic institutions hav contended with each other for the possession of "waifs," each waif secured being the basis for a demand on the public treasury. Were the appropriations to cease, there would be a glut in the waif market. Charity as an enterprise would be no longer profitable, and the institutions would unload their present stock as fast as possible. The effect would at first appear to be bad, though not wholly without precedent. For examples, look at the results of the Parkhurst raids, which drove hundreds of social waifs from their homes and destroyed their means of livelihood; the emancipation of the slaves, which threw upon their own resources a whole race of people who had been provided for previously by their owners; the abolition of polygamy, breaking up families and leaving women unprotected; the interference with the liquor traffic, throwing hundreds out of employment. However these measures are viewed, whether any or all of them hav resulted in good, it is certain that they worked hardships as serious as those which the Roman Catholics claim would follow the withdrawal of public support from their asylums and protectories.

The Catholic church by its teachings with regard to reckless propagation is responsible for the big litters of ill-begotten progeny that afflict the community, and those who support that church are morally bound to support the results of its doctrins. I would therefore like to see that organization left to its own resources. With state aid withdrawn we would very soon be in a position to judge how much of its charity is benevolence and how much is business. On the general subject of charity Herbert Spencer has very sagely intimated that the surest way to encourage pauperism is to make elaborate provisions for the support of paupers.

GEO. E. MACDONALD.

In the Field.

On Sunday, May 27th, I gave two lectures in St. Joseph, Mo., where arrangements were made by that life-long Liberal, Mr. G. G. Beck. The Turners gave us the free use of their hall, and fair audiences were present. St. Joseph has a population of about sixty thousand and is well supplied with religion. A convent with its military walls rises before the eye and a school for the preservation of ignorance called the "Young Men's College" will also attract the notice of the stranger. Liberals are by no means scarce. Mr. P. V. Wise, a subscriber to the Investigator since 1845, never loses an opportunity to deal the old theology a blow. Next to him I may mention Messrs. J. J. Taylor, Fred Grasloff, Lewis Herwig, M. Truckenmiller, and Charles Ebersole. THE TRUTH SEEKER has a large circulation among St. Joseph Freethinkers, and other Liberal papers are well represented.

I was the guest of Mr. Beck, at whose home I spent many pleasant hours. Mr. Beck is a man who does us proud. He puts heart and soul into Freethought, and to him more than anyone else is due the fact that the lectures were successful.

On Monday I left St. Joseph for Shenandoah, Ia., a town in the most charming section of southwestern Iowa. Mr. J. C. Brown, Dr. Humphrey, and Mr. John Ross met me at the depot. Mr. Brown and Dr. Humphrey I had met at the Congress last fall. They take the activ part in our movement in Shenandoah and a large element of Liberals support them. Mr. A. S. Bailey, who is connected with the Sentinel, often fires red-hot shot into the orthodox camp. He writes tracts in reply to the preachers and circulates them extensivly. Mrs. Bailey is also enthusiastic in the great work of mental emancipation. My lectures were given in the lately erected Universalist church. Owing to my visit being at the time that the people were engaged in preparing for Decoration Day, I did not hav very large audiences, but they were attentiv and appreciativ.

Shenandoah has fourteen churches and a Christian college. The sanitary regulations of the city, like its religion, are very bad, and when walking some of the principal streets one is reminded that he has olfactory organs. These churches demand support from the business men under pain of the invincible Christian boycott, and it takes Mr. Ross to teach them a severe lesson, which he does when they ask him for a contribution.

While I was there the country was suffering from a severe drouth which threatens the crops. Arrangements were made to bombard heaven and cause rain to fall in spite of God, who has been withholding it. Here is a triumph of science over theology.

During the hot summer months I shall do but little lecturing. In August I start on my trip through the northern states. Friends in Atlantic in Iowa, Yankton in South Dakota, Fargo and Auslem in North Dakota, in Crookston, Fairmount, Adrian, and St. Charles in Minnesota, and in Patch Grove and Whitehall in Wisconsin, hav written me, and I hope to hear from many more. If possible I want to spend a month in these states.

In looking over a Christian paper, the Lutheran Observer, I find a long article by Emilio Castelar, the noted Spanish Freethinker, upon the present state of European affairs. The Observer mentions the fact that he is an unbeliever and expresses surprise that an Infidel should entertain such sensible views, for it indorses all his sentiments. Of course it would hav been inconsistent with his rôle as a minister for the editor of the Observer to tell his readers that Infidels in all ages hav maintained the inalienable rights of impartial liberty, the pursuit of happiness, and equal justice to all, against Christian despotism and persecution. Intelligent people are finding this to be true notwithstanding.

In Des Moines there is an institution known as the "Sunbeam Mission." Every Sunday morning it advertises a free breakfast to all men who will agree to accompany the superintendent to some orthodox church, and free lemonade and cookies to all children who will go to Sunday school. Religion, like bitter medicin, must be given in small doses mixed with something palatable. Christianity has reached a point where it will take advantage of a man's hunger to force upon him its stale dogmas and unhealthy, demoralizing teachings. This is truly the Christian charity we hear so much about, where they compel one to giv up his manhood for a crust.

FRANKLIN STEINER.

Sparks From the Lecture Field.

Following up the train of events in the course of my work I eventually arrived at Cincinnati, where I took part in a joint debate with Prof. J. S. Van Cleve before the Oh o Liberal Society. The subject was "Christian Morality vs. Secular Morality," and my opponent, being in the affirmativ, opened the debate with a thirty-minute speech. The debate was nothing out of the usual line, except, perhaps, in the fact that the professor abstained from those gross personalities for which the "debating" element among the clergy stands distinguished. Socially, and on the platform, he is a thorough gentleman. His arguments were those common in such cases. Stereotyped, and even hoary with age, refuted time and again, it was an exceedingly easy task to meet them. He is not quite so orthodox as most of the preachers who hav debated with me, or asked questions at my lectures. He is a well-bred man, and possesseth a remarkable memory. At the conclusion he frankly admitted that he had been unequal to the task, although expressing a willingness to meet me again. His orthodoxy can be accounted for only through the power of association and the force of early training.

A genuin desire to do good is no necessary part of any religious system, for when a man is in earnest about doing the right, then will he always do it, and he needs no compulsion. The debate was given before an audience of five or six hundred people, although an admission fee had been charged. They represented all shades of religious beliefs and disbeliefs, and we may safely assume that the Freethinkers of the Garden City hav reaped a rich harvest from the encounter.

Three years ago this society first saw the light of day—a small beginning then, but the results hav been great and lasting. Impositions and frauds of all kinds hav been exposed and brought to light through them. The society is now a recognized and permanent institution in the city. I gave the opening lecture of the society, and am always pleased to visit our friends in Cincinnati. Stout hearts and willing hands hav made such a marked and decided improvement that the future seems filled with bright promises and hopes.

Mechanicsburg was the next place on my list. I gave three lectures here to good audiences. A church dedication was in progress at the time, and many people, even some Liberals, had been laboring under the impression that our lectures had been got up for the mere purpose of a special opposition. This is not true, for my dates had been set long before the date of dedication had been made known; and I would say that the reverse would be far nearer the truth. But when will Liberals cease attending the churches, and even contributing to their support? Can they learn anything new? Or do they gain anything by it? Do not they thus assist in the welding of the chain that binds down the freedom of their thoughts, utterances, and actions?

A debt of seven thousand dollars still hung over the new church; a special sky-pilot had been imported from New York to raise the amount, and so well did he succeed in terrifying the people with hell and damnation that he quickly raised the required sum with an additional three thousand. Thus are the providence and the labors of the people diverted from a useful channel. Ten thousand dollars given toward the erection of churches in which to worship a dream tyrant in the skies, while thousands of poor little children are sobbing themselvs in hunger to sleep every night!

I spent one day with George Van Ness, another with his brother, J. S. Van Ness, and another with Mr. Cheney and his family, an old Liberal of many years standing. His family all share in his belief, and general good cheer is found in their home. Jake Van Ness and Wm. Munn stand with the boys in our ranks at the head of the column. Elmer Miller came from Crayon and stayed over until the lectures were through.

Delphos comes next in turn, and here again I giv three lectures. Less than a year ago this town had its first Freethought lectures, and in this short period of time it has developed and maintained a successful and constantly strengthening Freethought organization. Good advertising in the surrounding country—one of the secrets of success in our meetings—brought in many visitors, some friends coming from Continental, Lima, and Dixon. One feature was noticeable in this instance—the large increase in the attendance of women. This is a circumstance worthy of full appreciation when we consider that these are the mothers of immediate posterity.

"Joe Roth's church" is bound to be a success. Already it has become a source of despair to the local clergy. The deacons perform their duties faithfully and well, and here in this little Ohio town may be recognized one grand truth: While we can not all be lecturers, writers, or poets, we can all join in the great and glorious work of human progress, and thus hasten the ultimate triumph of our cause.

During the summer months I shall lecture in Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, and Illinois. I hav already a few engagements upon my list in each of the states named. I want the Liberals to assist us in our work, arrange for lectures wherever possible, and help us to keep up a constant agitation against church domination. JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH,

Secretary Freethought Federation of America,
234 S. Water st., Chicago, Ill.

It is hard to tell whether the atrocities perpetrated by the English in Africa are worse than those of the Germans in Africa, or those of the French in Africa. But the reports from the English in Mashonaland, and the French at Timbuctoo, and the Germans in the Cameroons, are certainly most repulsiv reading for any civilized people. Savages of the blackest hue were never guilty of more cruel or more infamous deeds than the troops and the agents of these three European powers hav recently been guilty of in Africa. Africa seems doomed to suffer from the progress of the thing called Christian civilization.—New York Sun.

The advocates of Sunday laws claim to hav discovered in nature a basis for Sabbath laws. We are told by them that car wheels will crack if kept running seven days in the week! This and all similar claims are simply ingenious sophistries, invented to justify the existence and enforcement of Sunday laws. The facts are simply these: While the day, the month, and the year are indicated in nature, and the time for physical rest and recuperation by the regularly recurring daily periods of darkness, inducing sleep, there is nothing in nature indicating the division of time into weeks. The grass grows as fast, the waves dash as high, the sun shines as bright, and the storm beats as loud on the Sabbath as on other days. The robin builds her nest and the beaver his dam as industriously on the day set apart by the creator as holy time as on the other six days. · · · That Sabbath laws are religious is evident from the following facts: 1. They originated when the church and the state were first united. The first Sunday law was enacted by Constantine, who is commonly known as the first Christian emperor. 2. The demand for them comes only from religious people, and those whom they succeed in enlisting with them in their cause. 3. The disregard of them is decried because it lessens church attendance; the enforcement of them, then, must be to increase church attendance. —The World of Mystery.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

Heston's cartoon on the first page was suggested by the following remarks by Leonard Moody, leading trustee of the Tabernacle, as reported by the New York correspondent of the Portland (Maine) Eastern Argus:

"'That fire,' said Mr. Moody, earnestly, 'was a providential dispensation. I think it was Christ's way of helping us. He certainly did help us, I think. After I got in the board we paid all our current obligations. We got the Sage mortgage extended. We raised money by popular appeal. We did all we could, and then Dr. Talmage preached his farewell sermon. And then,' he continued, in a slow and solemn voice, 'Christ said to us: "Boys, you've done well. I'll relieve you of your troubles." And then he burned the church.' As Mr. Moody uttered these last words his voice sank almost to a whisper and his manner was intensely earnest."

Judge McAdam of the Superior Court rendered an eminently just decision in this city recently. A workman in the employ of the elevated road had on Sunday fallen from a badly built scaffold and received probably permanent injuries. A jury gave him $15,000 damages. The company asked for a new trial, one of the grounds being that as the mishap occurred on Sunday "the workman was a wrong-doer before the law and therefore not entitled to recover." It was shown that the workman was laboring under the supervision of the railroad's foreman. Judge McAdam refused to grant a new trial, brushing aside the citations from the opinions of Massachusetts courts as irrelevant, inasmuch as the decisions of the Bay state courts "depend so much on the peculiar legislation and customs of that commonwealth as to be regarded as inapplicable to injuries received in this state." No honest man can defend a law which would relieve from responsibility the employer whose workmen hav been injured by reason of his culpable negligence. All such laws are unjust, and they are unconstitutional, because they deny and nullify the obligation of contracts. The same vital objection lies against all statutes that permit employers and third parties to sue for the recovery of wages paid for Sunday work. In this category is included the infamous Kyle-Johnson National Sunday Rest bill, pending in Congress.

In its fanatical hatred of the Sunday newspaper the Christian Statesman wildly declares:

"The highwayman, who holds up his victim for his money, breaks the law for gain. The publisher of the Sunday newspaper does the same thing for the same purpose. The excuse that it is to meet a demand or a necessity in the community, is a simple subterfuge. If there were no money in it, there would be no Sunday paper."

If there were no money in it there would be no stores and steamship lines and book binderies and florists and an amazingly small number of preachers. Men and women of common sense, who want to earn their living as they go along, are not likely to deliberately choose or long willingly remain in a business or profession that yields no returns. It is no more discreditable to make money publishing a Sunday paper then it is to make it running a farm or conducting a manufacturing enterprise or selling shoe laces on the streets. No one but a bigot for whom there is no hope would hav the audacity to class together the highwayman and the Sunday newspaper publisher. Who is compelled to buy the Sunday paper or read it or advertise in it? And who the more resembles the highwayman, the publisher who givs his customers a big five cents' worth of reading for his nickel, or the minister who preaches about morality in an untaxed church and advocates the forcible legal appropriation of one-seventh of the citizen's time for the benefit of said minister and his partners?

The Nashville Christian Advocate observes that "religion has been greatly damaged in its robust vigor, in its militant force," by the latter-day view that Jesus was "the pattern of womanish mildness, the impersonation of sanctified weakness." It adds that "the modern Christ is the creation of poetry, painting, sentiment. It is not the Christ of the New Testament." This harmonizes with our often-expressed opinion that there was a direct connection between the teachings attributed to Jesus and the indescribable atrocities that buried the world in blood in the ages when religion was in the heyday of its "robust vigor" and hurled its "militant force" as a whirlwind of malevolent destruction against nearly everything that was tender and true, just and free and noble, in the nations over which hung its dense black clouds of ignorance and hate. The Christian Advocate devotes two and a half columns of one issue to a defense of the dogma of eternal hell, arguing that it has been one of the mightiest of forces for the salvation of man. It is refreshing to find now and then a Christian who has not learned to play fast and loose with the creed of Christendom, but it is fortunate also for the world that there are too few of this kind of the professed followers of the old believers to set up another inquisition or hang witches once more on Salem hill. Here is what the editor in question concludes about "Christ and Hell:"

"These instances will suffice to show that humanity, as Christ taught, must be restrained, emancipated, and stimulated by the doctrin of eternal punishment. He deals with human nature as it is, the most irrepressible and lawless thing, and he moves, elevates, and regenerates it by the mightiest moving forces."

THE great procession in honor of the seventeenth national feast of the German singing societies helped to draw many away from the Manhattan Liberal Club last Friday evening when Edward Dobson lectured on "Spontaneous Generation." It was an able and interesting lecture and those that were there seemed to appreciate it. The lecturer claims that as life is a mode of motion, and as motion is co-existent and co-eternal with matter, life must also be eternal. And he also said, in that case there can be no origin of life, only a development of the forms which exhibit life. He thus accounted for the forms by saying that water contains all the chemical affinities necessary to make protoplasm, the first form of life, and that in the intermingling of the element such formations would arise and in due time become stable and progress in the course of evolution. He also reviewed the objections against the theory, both theological and scientific, and described the ideas some of the old Grecian philosophers, especially Lucretius, had in regard to the problem of life.

A public-spirited citizen comes handsomely to the assistance of the pure-minded and self-sacrificing A. Comstock in this letter to the World: "Thinking it the duty of all good citizens to aid Mr. Anthony Comstock in his crusade against indecency, I desire to call Mr. Comstock's attention to the large number of children born in the city in a state of nudity. Mr. Comstock should check this practice by seizing and destroying these horrible examples of the nude.—A COMSTOCKITE."

The horses which the angels rode during the "late unpleasantness" in heaven all had legs, which they worked vigorously in space, while sailing along on their wings, some galloping, some trotting, and some pacing. Whenever they struck a cloud they would swamp down, drowning both horse and angel.

Letters of Friends.

In Sorrow's Shadow.

SYLVANIA, O., June 11, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I ask your pardon for my delay in renewing. I hav no idea of ever allowing my name dropped from your list as long as I am able to raise the price. I am suffering under great bereavement in the loss of my dearly beloved wife, Mary G. Burnham, who passed out (by suicide caused by disease of brain) April 8, 1894. By a previous arrangement our old friend and champion of Freethought, J. H. Burnham, officiated. Mary was a life-long Freethinker. H. E. BURNHAM.

He Buys, Reads, and Lends.

GERMANTOWN, PA., June 8, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $7 for renewal of subscription, "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," "Thumbscrew and Rack," "Religion a Curse," "Lectures on Astronomy." Money is rather scarce, but we must do what we can to help the cause along.

Now, I don't wish you to send those other books if you cannot afford to do it out of the amount I send you, but I want to get all the books I can afford, because I like to lend them out where I think they will be likely to do good.

Mr. Putnam at Northport.

NORTHPORT, N. Y., June 17, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Putnam has spent a week with us and has fired another bomb into the Christian camp, for you must know that when an Infidel comes to Northport he is treading upon holy ground. One thing our Christian friends must get credit for; they will not come to ask any questions, and by pursuing this course they are able to make up their minds that they hav got the best of the argument, for when a Christian meets his match he becomes both deaf and dumb. Even the Rev. Dr. Saunders did not hav the pluck to come to any of the meetings this time and pay his respects to Mr. Putnam, but still he could not resist the temptation to come to the door and having a look at him; whether some unseen power drove him there or not I don't know. Persons sitting near the rear observed the dominie's intelligent face peering in at the door; probably he was getting material for his Sunday sermon, but as soon as the lecture was over he disappeared as ghosts did in Bible times. Well, we did not get many Christians into the hall, but they were around the building; they were about the windows and doors, whistling and talking, and every now and then there could be observed two or three faces of men and women furtivly glancing through the doorway; probably they wanted to hav the satisfaction of seeing a real live Infidel, and I am pleased to say that they saw one, and a good substantial one at that. I think he would make as good-looking a figure for a statue or for a picture as any of the illustrious dominies round about here. We had another little Christian trick played on us. We had some hand bills thrown around the village, but they were soon gathered up and gotten out of sight. They were printed for the purpose of letting our Christian friends know that Mr. Putnam was going to reply to Mr. Hastings, the great anti-Infidel who came to Northport for the purpose of making it so hot for Infidelity that no Infidel would come to the place any more. He was advertised as if he was the great I Am. He came, they barricaded him behind the altar, the minister stood sentry over him, and it was then given out that there must be no questions asked; if anyone wished to do so he must write to Mr. Hastings. Well, he started off to tell children's stories, such as the hen and the eggs, the man and the watch, such as I used to hear amongst children when I went to school. And he told the riddles, but he was like any other child; he did not answer them himself. But then the whole of Christianity is a mass of riddles which they cannot answer themselvs, and they will not ask an Infidel. J. SCOTT.

The Happiness of Humanity Is Our Religion.

EVANSVILLE, IND., June 5, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I hav never seen any letters in your paper from the Freethinkers of Evansville, so I come to the front and ask for a little space in your valuable paper. I am a telegraph operator as well as a true and full-fledged Freethinker. In my daily work at the keys I "think often, full often of you." I hav twice during the past year had occasion to speak from the rostrum to the people of my nativ state, Kentucky, about the greatest of all great causes, the liberty and freedom of speech and thought. I am a free talker on matters pertaining to religion and very frequently my orthodox acquaintances call me a "damned fool," an expression that has ever been considered by them through the countless ages of the past as the Koh inoor of all the jewels of speech and is the usual reply given by them to all arguments which they cannot answer.

This morning there was handed to me a small envelope issued by one of the Baptist churches of this city soliciting the amount of $2.50 from each person who receives one of the envelopes; needless to say that I did not giv them anything, for near the top of the envelope was this inscription, "Giv what you can and God will bless you;" that is, if you do not giv that which you can God will not bless you. What is the blessing of such a God as that worth?

I cannot see that the church-givers are any more blessed than I am, and I know a great many of them who are not blessed as much as I am. My opinion is that we are blessed just in the proportion that we bless ourselvs and bless one another, and we are not, in my judgment, indebted to the church, the Bible, or to the useless leaflets, to the Baptist, or any other church, for our knowledge of true happiness. I am a Freethinker and I am glad of it.

We know by reading history, and the Bible itself shows conclusivly as anything can, that religion has been the cause of a great deal of bloodshed and woe and unhappiness in this world, and it is, in the words of Ingersoll "the great corrupter of the people." We find that just in proportion as we educate the people the less use they hav for that myth called "religion." The more knowledge we hav the greater our happiness will be. The closer we adhere to the natural, that which is, the greater will be our contempt for the supernatural or unnatural, and I hope the day will not be long postponed when this country will be truly great and free. Let us hurry the cause of freedom and estab lish a free country for our children and our children's children. May the time come when our children cannot hear the word "religion" pronounced without bringing the blush of shame to the cheek of modesty.

We should teach the people of the world that the happiness of humanity is our religion, a religion greater far than all the wealth beneath the sea, and show to them, too, that the greatest devil, or Satan known to mankind is the church.

There is no Secular Union in this city, and I should be pleased to hav some of the organizers visit this city and make an effort to establish such a Union, for, I assure you, it is greatly needed; and although there are quite a number of Freethinkers here, we should be organized and hav a lecture occasionally to arouse the spirit of progression.

Ingersoll lectured here at the Grand Opera House, May 5, 1893, on that great man, Shakspere, to a full house. Who will be the next one to come forward and proclaim the truth?

Yours for freedom, R. L. LEGATE.

Probably He Will Reap the Whirlwind.

NEENAH, CAL., June 12, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Kindly permit me a little space for another presentation of a subject which, before the appearance of an article by L. G. Reed in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 12th, almost relapsed into a condition of innocuous desuetude. There are certain things in this world which are studiously tabooed; so the Liberal persistently refuses to see woman suffrage as it should be viewed by every man who calls himself a Freethinker—viz., in the light of another Kyle Sunday bill. THE TRUTH SEEKER has filled columns denouncing the Kyle bill; not one word against woman suffrage, which, if the signs of the times point to anything, will work a greater destruction to our personal liberty and liberty of conscience than half a dozen Kyle bills. Mr. Reed says: "At no time has Christianity treated woman as man's equal." Christianity is at the present time in these United States treating woman as man's equal in every respect, and in many respects as his superior. All this talk about Christianity treating woman as an inferior in this country makes me tired. There are comparativly very few preachers who do not advocate woman suffrage, and religious people in general giv to woman as much liberty to do as they please (except in certain social forms and usages decreed by custom and as much obeyed by Liberals as by Christians) as any Freethinkers. Christians may be foolish in their beliefs, but they are certainly not so in their manner of perpetuating Christianity. Some time since the sister of Speaker Crisp sent letters to seven or eight of the most prominent women of the country requesting their opinion on woman suffrage. Strange as it may seem to woman suffragists, a majority of these women were not in favor of granting the ballot to women. Of course the religious question was carefully avoided in their answers. This is a point, you know, on which you must not touch, no matter how important to present or future generations. Miss Frances Willard's answer, to a person who reads between the lines, tells the tale. She says among other things, that where woman has been allowed to vote immoral persons and liquor fiends hav been made to tremble before the majesty of the law. This, in other words, means that THE TRUTH SEEKER, R. G. Ingersoll, S. P. Putnam, and all other horrid Infidels, will ere long tremble in their boots.

You will notice how those people always cloak their villainous attempts at our liberty with the phrases, "Regulation of the liquor traffic" (prohibition); "Sunday rest" (inquisition); "Lottery matter and obscene matter not allowed to go through the mails" (press censorship, aimed at THE TRUTH SEEKER and other "blasphemous" publications).

Can you think for a moment that woman will be content to merely drop her ballot like an automaton. Not much; the most of them will do as did one of their leaders, whose sentiments, very forcibly expressed to the writer, were, that no Infidel should be allowed to hold office or hav anything whatever to say in the government. Talk about narrow-mindedness! Can any being on the face of the earth come up to a woman in that respect? And these are the creatures who want to turn the tables on their present lords and masters! They are the beings who want the word "male" stricken out of the constitution of the state of New York! If woman gets the ballot in the next fifty years, it will retard the cause of freedom twice that many years. What are they doing at the present moment in New Zealand, where all respectable females over twenty-one years of age are entitled to vote? At the last election, wherever there was a candidate whose "morals" were of a dubious standing he was unmercifully cut. Let me remark here that there are very few women indeed who can distinguish any difference between morality and religion. I hav a notion it would be as impossible in that country for an Infidel to be chosen for office as for the rich man, the camel, needle's eye, etc., of Bible fame.

ALBERT SANDBERG.

Mortuary—H. M. Fisher.

PENACOOK, N. H., June 12, 1894.

How sweet the moonlight sleeps upon this bank. —Shakspere.

A good man, a stanch Freethinker and radical has disappeared, a busy, activ life on earth is stilled. Hiram Mason Fisher was born in Danville, Vt., Aug. 10, 1817; died (as it is popular to say) June 8, 1894, at 1:30 P.M., at his home in Penacook, N. H., where he had lived thirty years. His sickness was short and painless—taking his bed only Monday before the Friday of his death, which was peaceful and without a struggle. "Death and his brother sleep," the beautiful, brave, suffering Shelley said.

Both his parents were Baptists; the father, Lewis Fisher, being a minister of some local fame. The son, being of an ardent temperament, early in his teens espoused the tenets of his parents, being baptized in winter, when it took some courage to be dipped through a hole cut in the ice in a Vermont climate.

He received only a common school education, but, being very fond of reading and investigating all questions, in a few years he evoluted into more light and became a Universalist, which at that time was more unpopular than to be an Atheist to-day. He then read phrenology, hydropathy, etc., as taught by Combe, the Fowlers, Dr. Trall, and others, and became an earnest defender of their teachings. About the same time he read Garrison's paper, the Liberator, and became an Abolitionist. Astronomy and geology next attracted his attention and of these he was a great reader ever after. Then came Paine's political and religious works, Voltaire, Hume, etc., when he found himself in a still more fascinating and useful light—a Freethinker of the broadest and most advanced type, remaining so to the last. He saw nearly, if not entirely, around the horizon of progress, and was never dazed by its light.

Though plain in dress and unassuming in manner, he was always among the advance guard in reform, ready to accept any truth, however unpopular, and to aid any cause tending to free the race from any and all forms of superstition and tyranny—religious, political, financial, or social. He was not, I am glad to say, one of those reformers who think they hav attained the top round of the ladder of progress and freedom when they hav only got rid of religious superstitions. He opposed with zeal and good sense the fundamental principles usually advocated by ministers, doctors, and lawyers.

He was an earnest and devoted sympathizer with D. M. Bennett, E. H. Heywood, Moses Harman, and others, in all their unjust and trying persecutions and imprisonments under the Comstock statutes, taking all their papers and reading them thoroughly and many of their books, and aiding some, if not all, with money.

He was a great reader, as well as attentiv to his business, having a library of one thousand volumes of history, biography, and the various reforms of our time, and he was familiar with most of them. At the time of his death he was taking twenty-three papers and magazines, including nearly all those devoted to radical reform—the Investigator, THE TRUTH SEEKER, Lucifer, Liberty, Ironclad Age, etc.—besides dailies and weeklies of all political parties. He kept posted on all the political intrigues, but was more especially devoted to the radical questions of our day that the daily papers dare not, or do not, touch, and which he thought they had "not brains enough to comprehend."

He arose at 4 A.M. and on Sundays earlier in order to do the large amount of reading he always had on hand. He was temperate, even abstemious, in his habits, never using tea, coffee, cider, beer, nor any kind of spirituous liquors. In early life he used tobacco, but left it off entirely many years ago. He ate meat very sparingly, was a vegetarian in theory and nearly so in practice, and very much opposed to capital punishment and all forms of cruelty. He was never confined to his bed with sickness a day in his life until June 4, 1894, had a fine physique and magnetic temperament. He told me a year ago that even at that age—seventy-five years—while polishing his ax handles sparks of light would often be seen escaping from the ends of his fingers. His lips at the time of his death were as pink and beautiful as most young persons'. He was a reticent man, shunning instead of seeking society, yet fearless in expressing his opinions on any and all questions when called upon to do so, and he was known for his sterling integrity and sincerity, his word being as good as his note or bond.

The funeral was held at his pleasant, commodious home, Sunday, June 10th, Rev. Mr. Illman, a Universalist from Concord, officiating. It was a very Liberal, progressiv discourse for a believer in Christianity, and I am told by those who hear him often that he, with many other prominent ministers of to-day, does not believe in the infallibity of the Bible nor in the immaculate conception. He is a very fine looking and attractiv appearing man, and I hope he is leading his congre gation into broader and more delightfu fields of light and liberty. In closing the funeral services he repeated the poem, "He Who Died at Azim," with marked ability and attractivness.

Our friend Fisher did not believe in immortality and made no provision as to his funeral, though he appears to hav had a presentiment of his death, for he told his son, who was in business with him, the last time he left the manufactory, that he should probably never return there again. That was twelve days before his death.

He left a wife, seventy-three years old, and four children—Mrs. Harriet Barnard, of Concord, N. H.; Mrs. Gertrude Garland, of New Haven, Conn.; Charles Fisher, of Allentown, N. H., where their manufactory is, and Miss Myrta Fisher, at their home in Penacook, N. H.

JAY CHAAPEL.

Again Rhadamanthus and the A. P. A.'s.

WASHINGTON, D. C. June 17, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I do not like to occupy so much of the very valuable space of THE TRUTH SEEKER in apologizing for the existence of the American Protectiv Association, but your somewhat lengthy comment upon my letter concerning this organization in your issue of June 9th justifies me in asking for a little room in which I want to show you that (again using the words of our friend Reynolds) "you are away off," and what you are most "off" on is this: That you do not recognize or acknowledge the aid of any man or body of men in the great work of secularizing the government who do not place themselvs broadly upon the advanced platform of the modern Freethinker. How long, think you, would the few thousand Freethinkers in America be eliminating from the organic law and the statutes the ecclesiasticism which by the leniency of the founders of the government it was made possible for religious fanatics to worm in such veins of churchism as hav all along tended to combine what these founders intended and hoped would be separate in this country, viz, church and state? It is is no insignificant warfare we hav on our hands. It would hav been comparativly easy for the generations following the Jeffersons and Paines and Franklins of those times to hav widened the principles of religious liberty incorporated in our system of government by them, and so by this time hav succeeded in eliminating the last vestige of ecclesiasticism therefrom, if only Quakerism, Wesleyism, Episcopalianism, or Presbyterianism had been in the way; and these only appeared to them as in the way at that time. Hence the incompleteness of the fundamental law-barriers erected by them. But no sooner were the foundations of religious freedom laid down in America than Rome awoke from a temporary lethargy, and glancing with wistful eye across the ocean, saw, as that devil of fifteen hundred years alone is capable of seeing, a new government to subdue, and a new continent upon which to rear her stupendous fabric of tyranny. It might require a century or a dozen centuries, said she, to capture the new republic; but Rome never sleeps. And we hav been warned of her intentions by every thoughtful historian, and statesman, and warrior from Lafayette to Lincoln, and yet there seem to be people among us who do not see, or who will not open their eyes to see, that we are on the very brink of destruction from this one source. Don't talk to me about the present being a warfare upon the religion of the Catholic. Catholicism is not a religion; never has been. If it were a system of religion merely, we could classify it with all the other religious superstitions of the world, and along with the Freethinker and the Secularist work for its overthrow upon these lines. And therefore I ask you, dear Mr. Editor, first get rid of the idea that the American Protectiv Association, as an organization, "discriminates" against the Romanist "on account of his religion;" and it is unjust that you should quote in evidence against the order the editorial statement of the Omaha American or any other journal that sides with us in this final effort to overthrow this Modern Machiavelianism in America. Shall we not accept the assistance of all, irrespectiv of minor considerations, who will, in any way contribute to the defense of the nation? Do we not gladly accept and welcome the assistance of the Seventh Day Adventists in our fight with Rome's disguised lieutenants, the National Reform Association, who are aiding her to insinuate religious legislation into our laws? We do not approve of their church doctrins, yet we gladly accept their powerful aid in our noble work of secularization. And so long as Dr. King and the National League render so valuable aid to Brother Putnam when that veteran warrior bursts in upon a Congressional Committee charged with the consideration of any anti-secular measure, why should we object if he or his society are not exactly up to the advanced position upon these questions taken by the Freethinker? Who of us during the bitter fight over the Indian Appropriations bill just brought to a close in Congress yesterday, and as usual terminating in a victory for the Catholic "church," stopped to consider the religious complexion of the gallant two dozen who stood nobly out against the infamous measure? And none did better work against it than Dr. King and his assistants. The American Protectiv Association, as I said before, cares not a fig about the religious views of any one. It is not fighting anybody's religion. Do not forget this. "No religion can be crushed out by political combinations," say you in your comments. In the name of all the gods at once, if the civil or political power or "combination" cannot crush out the supremacy of religion in our government, what can? The Freethinkers in the American Protectiv Association are not fraternizing with Protestants on any sectarian platform.

I inclose a copy of the platform of the American Protectiv Association—an authorized platform of principles—which I wish you to scan carefully (and reprint if you will) and if you discover in it any sectarianism I promis you I will not for a day longer remain in coöperativ association with the organization. It constitutes the basic principles for which the order is contending, and I cannot for my life see why Freethinkers—who are loyal and patriotic if any persons are—should not affiliate with any and all others who adopt these patriotic principles and contend for their supremacy in our government. As a Freethinker I stand firmly by the "Demands of Liberalism," but I think I can best contribute to the ultimate realization of those demands by accepting the cooperation of all Americans who place fealty to law and government above the dictum of a political power wholly alien to anything American and whose adherents are by the highest authority taught to believe, and sworn to obey, the utterances which teach that "the Catholic religion with all its rights ought to be exclusivly dominant in such sort that every other worship shall be banished and interdicted" (Pope Pius IX.), and that "it is an error to believe that the church ought to be separated from the state, and the state from the church" (Pope Pius IX., in his Syllabus of Errors). Then, later, "We can hav the United States in ten years, and I want to giv you three points for your consideration: The Indians, the negroes, and the public schools" (Archbishop Ireland, in a speech at Rome, 1892). This scheme of Ireland's is the greatest plan of war ever mapped out, and Catholic victories all along the line prove its wisdom and strategy.

I find I hav written already too long a letter and hav not nearly covered the ground laid out or called up by your comments, so I close with this one precautionary remark, Do not imagin for a moment that the Freethinkers in the American Protectiv Association do not know what they are about, or that the organization with which they are allied is battling against Jesuitry on account of any little tin Jesuses or wafer gods its adherents worship. We are aiding in the overthrow of popery throughout the world, and I repeat that the United States should, and soon must, banish from its confines, as all other nations of the earth hav been obliged to do, the infernal devilfish of Jesuitism, or our republic will soon be at an end.

RHADAMANTHUS.

[It is Rhadamanthus who is "away off," for we do not refuse to recognize the aid of those who do not "place themselvs broadly upon the advanced platform of the modern Freethinker." We are willing to accept all the help we can get, but this does not render it necessary for us to join the ranks of one sectarian organization in order to giv battle to another. We will fight the bad principles of both in our own way and leave them to weaken each other's strength in their own ways. Whatever of good results from their internecine strife we shall heartily welcome. Neither do we ask these people to place themselvs upon the Freethought platform, as Rhadamanthus asserts; but we do want them to stand honestly and actually upon the secular platform upon which they now stand only in profession. There is a vast difference between the two. Every Freethinker must logically be a secularist (and that is why we cannot be a member of the American Protectiv Association nor of any of its affiliated societies), but not every secularist is a Freethinker, as is shown by the Adventists. And right here it is well to answer Rhadamanthus's question in reference to our acceptance of the aid of these same Adventists. Most assuredly we do accept their assistance and regard them as close allies in the work of church and state separation. They antagonize the political designs of the Catholic church fully as determinedly and a thousand times more wisely than the American Protectiv Association does, but they do not stop there. They are just as quick to see Protestant encroachments as they are to detect Catholic invasions. They stand as squarely against sectarian instruction in the public schools as the American Protectiv Association does for that instruction. They oppose Sunday laws and all other religious legislation. What American Protectiv Association society or newspaper has denounced "Sabbath" enactments? Since we began these comments the Adventist paper, the American Sentinel, issue of June 21st, has come to our table. In it we find a long article headed "Some Plain Truths by an A. P. A." Its author is W. H. Seaman, of Boston, who declares that he is a stanch member of the order here under consideration. He wrote the article for the A. P. A. organ of Boston, the Citizen. In it he calls upon his comrades in the order to stand squarely upon the secular platform for complete divorce of church and state. He quotes he declarations of principles of the National Reform Association, the American Sabbath Union, and the Women's Christian Temperance Union. He also exposes the League for the Protection of American Institutions and the Evangelical Alliance. He shows that all these bodies are enemies of the civil state in that they are trying to build into the foundation and superstructure of our government the crumbling stone and rotten bricks of ecclesiasticism. Did the Citizen print Mr. Seaman's article? It did not. It did not dare to do so. It is not fighting theocratic principles but the Catholic church.

We are not in any sense the attorney of the Catholic church. We know her history. That is enough. But we hav no desire to fight her with forged encyclicals and catechisms, with distorted history, and appeals to religious prejudice and rancor. We read carefully many representativ papers of the "American" orders and we are perfectly free to say that their literature, as a whole, is narrow, sectarian, bigoted, Protestant in the worst sense, appealing to passion instead of to real patriotism, to religious antagonisms instead of to reason. And their history! Much truth is told, of course, but the careful student of religion and sociology would no more dare to risk his reputation for accuracy by indorsing in their entirety the statements of their writers than he would dare take such risk by guaranteeing the truth of the "history" which appears in Catholic school books. Here is a sample assertion: In the last number of the American Eagle which has come to hand an extended communication contains the startling information that our forefathers forsook all and fled to this country from papal rule!

We are compelled to still maintain that the "American" warfare against the Catholic church has its tap-root deep in the soil of religious hatred, rather than in that of pure secularism; and the evidence in support of this contention we hav been piling up for weeks, and we hav much more of it under our hand now than we can use here Rhadamanthus assures us that it is "unjust" that we should "quote against the order the editorial statement of the Omaha American or any other journal that sides with us," etc. This statement is inaccurate The Omaha American does not merely "side" with the order; it is entirely devoted to its interests. It could more truthfully be said that the New York Tribune "sides" with the Republican party, for, partisan as is the Tribune, it is less so than the American. We hav many times read the platform which Rhadamanthus incloses, and in our issue of April 21st we printed in full another "official" utterance, essentially the same as this, which we found in all the papers representing the order. We care little for the public official affirmation of principles of a secret political society. The acts of the society and the declarations of its newspapers constitute a more accurate index of its aims than does any platform. As has been well said, platforms are made to get in on, not to stand on. But this does not, by any means, imply that the platform is without fault. We mean only that the political party, and especially the secret political party, cannot be truly judged by those statements which it chooses to de nominate its platform of principles.

It sounds oddly to hear a Freethinker defend such a society as the League for the Protection of American Institutions in the way Rhadamanthus does. He says that it is not exactly up to our advanced position. We must say that "exactly" is good! It has to be confessed that Dr. King, standing for the use of the Bible in the schools, is a long way from being "exactly" in line with us.

As to the "gallant two dozen" Representativs who took the right position on the Indian appropriation bill, it might giv us more additional light if our correspondent would ascertain how they will vote if the pending Sunday bills come to an issue, and it might not be amiss to discover how such of them as were in Congress at that time stood as regarded the World's Fair Sunday closing business. We merely want to know whether it is hatred of a church or love of civil institutions that inspires their present action. When we know that we can better tell what we hav to depend on in the near future.

It seems necessary to insist that the A. P. A. does care a great deal for a man's religious views, else it would not insist upon proscriptiv measures of the most drastic nature against Catholics alone. If Catholics may not be employed in the public schools because they want to teach religion therein, then all Protestant teachers who wish to do the same thing must also stay without. Does the A. P. A. make this fair demand? Not by any means. If all Catholics are to be debarred from holding office, why should not theocratic Protestants be made subject to the same rule of exclusion? If the Jesuits ought to be banished, why should members of the National Reform Association be allowed to remain? The truth is, this talk about banishment and deprivation of citizen rights is an echo from the Inquisition, and in so far as Freethinkers join in it there is justified the taunt of the Christians that the only reason why Freethinkers hav not persecuted is because they hav never had the power. We cannot afford to giv this persecuting movement the least encouragement. It will destroy us if it succeeds. This crisis is subjecting us to such a test as we in this country hav never before been called upon to endure.

We do not in the least underrate the dangers that threaten us from church aggression, but we insist that nothing but the treachery of Protestants can subvert the civil republic. The Catholics are in the minority six to one. Nothing that they hav secured from the state could hav been theirs had not Protestants first tried to get all they could for themselvs. Protestants are not likely to do anything substantial for religious liberty until they about face and shut all churches away from the public crib and the seats of power. A mere war of proscription waged against the Catholic church because she has reaped more than has any other ecclesiastical body from the Protestant sowing is sheer folly. The clearest-headed Protestants see this; shall we be less keen of vision than they?—ED. T. S.]

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

True Heroes.

O seeker for some worthy deed to do,
Withdraw thy gaze from searching in the sky;
Recall thy hopes from out the by and by
And heed the path thy feet are passing through.

Great deeds are not those men endow with grace—
A daring feat, a mighty game of skill—
True heroes find their chances, when they will,
Amid to-day's vexatious common-place.

The Land of "Pretty Soon."

I know of a land where the streets are paved
With the things which we meant to achieve.
It is walled with the money we meant to hav saved;
And the pleasures for which we grieve,
The kind words unspoken, the promises broken,
And many a coveted boon,
Are stowed away there, in that land somewhere—
The land of "Pretty Soon."

There are uncut jewels of possible fame,
Lying about in the mildew and dust,
And many a noble and lofty aim
Is buried 'neath mold and rust.
And, oh! this place, while it seems so near,
Is farther away than the moon;
Though our purpose is fair, yet we never get there—
To this land of "Pretty Soon."

The road that leads to that mystic land
Is strewn with pitiful wrecks,
And the ships that hav sailed for its shining strand
Bear skeletons on their decks.
It is farther at noon than it was at dawn,
And farther at night than at noon;
Oh, let us beware of that land down there—
The land of "Pretty Soon." —Anonymous.

A Visit to Salt Lake City.

During the month of August last, when people from the east and the west, the north and the south, were going in thousands to Chicago to witness the great World's Fair that was being held there, your correspondent with two traveling companions concluded to visit Salt Lake City and get a glimps of the Rocky mountains. My traveling companions on this occasion were a boy nine years of age and a girl of nineteen (son and daughter .

We left Omaha via Union Pacific railway about 3 P.M., on the 21st day of the above-named month. Our train was described on the time card as the "Overland Flyer," and made stoppages at principal places only. Our first afternoon's journey was unimportant, being along the valley of the Platte river, an agricultural district where farming operations seem to be carried on quite extensivly. Prairie farmers were busy cutting, raking, and stacking their prairie hay, and extensiv cornfields resembling forests of young trees were seen in great abundance.

By the time we reached North Platte, 294 miles west of Omaha, we were overwhelmed in darkness and nothing more for the night could be seen.

Shortly after daylight next morning we reached Cheyenne, Wyoming, 519 miles from Omaha, and after waiting there about half an hour to allow passengers to partake of refreshments at the dining-hall, our train proceeded on its journey.

We then began to ascend the Rocky mountains, and it may be said that we then left art and civilization behind us and entered upon a region where Nature in all her romantic beauty reigns supreme. Rocks of every conceivable shape, size, and formation are scattered around in all directions. In many places single rocks of great magnitude resembling huge towers or castles are seen standing solitary and alone, while in other places they are seen to exist in groups or clusters, covering many acres in extent, and when situated, as they generally are, some distance from the point of observation they present the appearance of a city in ruins that has been visited by a cyclone or tornado or been laid waste by the destructiv artillery of an invading army. Scattered here and there among this great confusion of rocks are a few fir trees of sickly growth and feeble frame whose dwarfed appearance indicates their scanty sustenance.

That part of the state of Wyoming and territory of Utah traversed by the Union Pacific railway and all the surrounding country as far as the eye can reach in the distance is one vast wilderness wholly destitute of vegetation save and except the wild sagebrush so peculiar to that part of the country. Barren plains, rugged cliffs, and lofty mountains, the tops of which seem to touch the fleecy clouds, are continually in view and the eye of the traveler feasts with delight upon the great and grand natural scenery.

Looking from the car window as the train is running around the base of some of those great mountains, rocks of enormous size and many thousands of tons in weight are seen to hav left their fastenings and slid partly down the steep precipice, while in other places rocks equally as large seem to overhang the track and appear to endanger the safety of the rapidly-moving train. Such is the condition of the country for a distance of more than five hundred miles.

About 7 o'clock in the evening we reached Green River, and our train rested there about half an hour to giv the passengers an opportunity to open their pocket-books and contribute to the support of proprietors of dining-halls at and around the depot. When we left Green River the sun had sunk behind the western mountains, the shades of evening were beginning to fall, and darkness was again spreading her broad mantle over the bright face of nature, concealing for the time being every object of interest. We therefore remained passivly in our seats and meditated upon the scenes of the closing day. One o'clock next morning we reached Ogden, which is 1034 miles from Omaha, and 37 miles from Salt Lake City.

Ogden is the western terminus of the Union Pacific railway, and we had to wait there an hour for a train to complete our journey; at 2 A.M. our train is ready, and one hour later, 3 A.M., we arrive at Salt Lake City, and consequently the end of our journey.

Answers to Correspondents.

DAPHNE.—Your article would not only fill the whole of the Corner, but the greater part of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Our space forbids the printing of sermons or lengthy essays. Learn to condense.

W. L. P.—"Crimes and Criminals" will appear in due time, but must be divided on account of length.

W. C. S.—Many thanks for your kind notice of "Right Living." You must hav had a great time with the taciturn James, yet he much enjoyed his sojourn at Castle Comfort.

MCNEILL'S ISLAND.—Out of the darkness is born the light. Sunshine follows the shadows, and the roses bloom amid the waste places. Courage and patience will at length bring you to the goal of your desires.

ADELE B.—"Progressiv Eclecticism" is the title of D. G. Crow's new book. It is the scientific treatment of a great subject, hopeful and humanitarian.

W. SMITH.—If your name is not written in "The Lamb's Book of Life," it will be found in a far more worthy place, in the list of the world's great benefactors, where it will forever shine with bright and undiminished luster.

ABIEL J.—It does no good to talk back unless you can talk scientifically. Read all the good books you can get hold of. Send for Truth Seeker Catalog.

E. T. W., Pleasantdale, Me.—You must hav a fine collection of curios. Yes, we would be pleased to hav an article from your pen, but be brief. We can entertain only short speeches in the Corner.

R. S. C., Omaha—Glad to hear about the girls, Oliver, and Baby Henry.

Correspondence.

GOLDEN POND, KY., April 15, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first letter to the Corner. My papa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for a long while, and likes it very much. I liv on a farm between the Cumberland and Tennessee rivers.

I hav just returned from church this evening and had a nice time, but not listening to the preacher. Some of the people here are very religious, but it is weak—only lasts while they are in the church-house.

Our little town was visited by S. P. Putnam and J. R. Charlesworth. I hope to see them here again. The people, especially the sky-pilots, as they are called, giv the Infidels a very bad name. I heard an Infidel, while talking to a preacher, make this remark: "You people say that we Infidels are liars, thieves, and murderers, and will kill a man for ten cents; but havn't we killed a very small number since we hav been doing business here?" The preacher answered: "I don't know anything about the Infidels myself."

If I see this in print I will write again.

Your friend, FANNIE BOGARD.

P.S.—Please excuse bad writing and spelling and correct the mistakes. F. B.

[Your writing and spelling are good enough, and mistakes you should correct yourself.—ED. C. C.]

BATH-ON-THE-HUDSON, N. Y., June 8, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Through you and the Children's Corner I beg to acknowledge the receipt of two beautiful books, namely "Apples of Gold" and "The Story Hour," which I received with great pleasure this morning. For these beautiful presents I sincerely thank Mr. J. M. Peck, Sr., of Ottumwa, Ia., through whose great kindness they were forwarded to me, begging to let him know they will be read with pleasure by his little Atheist friend.

I am glad you remember me. Although I am ten years old, I hav never been to school, but that does not prevent me from studying everything.

You will be pleased to know that I was chosen orator for Decoration Day and recited a poem of my own composition, which I thought you would, perhaps, like to hav for your Children's Corner and which I forward to you for that purpose.

Your little Atheist friend,
MARIE LUMLEY.

In the early springtime
When the flowers giv their perfume,
And all nature seems rejoicing
And the birds are in full tune,
'Tis fit we turn our thoughts awhile
To the heroes of the past,
Who lie beneath the cold, cruel sea
Or underneath the grass.
Here in this peaceful land of ours—
In this land of liberty—
Here are around us every day
The remains of the brave and free,
Who raised the standard upon high
That all men should be free;
Who fought for the victory of human rights—
And the battle has been won;
Who fought for the destruction of slavery,
Disheartened by no defeat,
Appalled not by death nor danger,
Though the dead lay at their feet.
We'll remember your heroic services,
Brave, impetuous, and daring deeds,
As you fought for the child and its mother,
Irrespectiv of color or creeds.
We will revere you who are living
And o'er the graves of those who are dead
We will scatter the bud and the blossom
And the flag we will place at their head.
O you whose graves are moldering,
That we decorate to-day!
O you whose lives were sacrificed
For the freedom of the slave!
O you who stand amongst us,
The bravest of the brave,
May showers of blessings fall on you,
And let us ever say,
Whene'er you pass us on the street,
"Three cheers for the blue this day!"
And may the time be distant far
When you who stand near-by Shall hav laid down life's weary burden,
And with a thankful sigh,
Feel that life would hav been incomplete
But for the work that you hav done;
And you pass that mysterious toll-house gate
And never more return.

[Very creditable for a girl of ten years. —ED. C. C.]

ELEYVILLE, ARK., April 29, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As all the rest of the family hav gone to church I decided that I would write to the Children's Corner. As this is my first attempt to write to the Corner, I will try to relate my religious experience.

When I was a small boy I was made to go to church and Sunday-school against my will, and I was taught that Jesus was the only begotton son of God; that he died on the cross for the sins of the world. My teacher taught me that the cause of sickness and death was our mother Eve's eating an apple some six thousand years ago; and, as I was an ignorant boy, I believed it, as many others did, for I thought that the Christians knew what they were talking about. So, after I had reached the age of seventeen years, they would come around to me during the revival meetings in a state of melancholy, and with all the impudence of humanity, with all the deceitfulness of Brutus and Cassius, with all the hypocrisy that their hypocritical cloak could conceal, request me to go to the mourner's bench to "seek religion." Sometimes I would go just to please them; and after receiving their cruel strokes over my cranium and back until it seemed that my life had ebbed away, they would bow down over me and whisper those awful words: "Giv your heart to Jesus." So, after I had reached the age of nineteen years, they marched me to the "anxious seat" the second time, and continued, and doubled, and then repeated the cruel dose until I decided that I didn't want any of the "love of Jesus." So I bade them adieu and decided that I would as soon writhe in hell as to be murdered by religious cranks.

I was taught from a small boy, and believed the teachings, that the Bible was written by inspiration; that God, the father of the universe, dictated to the gentlemen, and I was taught that a man who would write or say anything against the Bible was not fit to exist, and that it would hav been better for him if he had never been born I hav heard preachers say that Tom Paine was one of the meanest men that ever existed.

So, when I reached the age of twenty-two years I bought a book, "Little Gems of Thought," from Robert G. Ingersoll, and found that Thomas Paine was not as bad as the preachers described him to be. I also got the works of Thomas Paine and Robert G. Ingersoll and subscribed for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and began to read the Bible in the right way.

The reason that the Bible is so generally believed is because the people don't read it for themselvs, but listen to some preacher, or when they do read it, they hav such scales on their eyes that they can't see and understand.

I would like to correspond with some of the Liberal girls.

Yours for Freethought,
JOSEPH P. PRICE.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

"With Daughter's Babe Upon His Knee"

A new edition of that splendid prose poem, "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt beveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

APOLLONIUS OF TYANA IDENTIFIED AS THE CHRISTIAN JESUS.

An important and remarkable revelation concerning the life and times of Apollonius of Tyana, the great sage and philosopher of the first century. It is here claimed that his life and teachings were appropriated and utilized by the formulators of the Christian religion in the interest of so-called Christianity. The plagiarism is made plain in this brief history of Apollonius, especailly in view of the historical references and comments thereon. It is quite evident that to conceal the plagiarism, the name of Apollonius was suppressed.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

A Liberal living in Michigan said once that he would give $25 a year to have the Crimes of Preachers recorded, as the frequent lapses of virtue of the ministers showed how little value Christianity possesses to make men moral.

We have just issued the Fourth Edition of the book doing this. The additions for this new edition of the

"Crimes of Preachers"

shows nearly 400 cases of ministerial conduct. While those in previous editions show that within a few years about

of one kind or another of criminal conduct. Most of the crimes are against women, for the fair sex are at once the weakness and the strength of the church—"the church" meaning of course the clergy.

Notwithstanding the many additional pages, we have kept the price the same, 25 cents. Send for a copy, and confound the churchmen. Show them just what sort of scamps are the clergy who have closed the World's Fair on Sunday, because it is so holy a day that to look upon machinery or paintings in this period is "immoral."

By SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

It is, besides being a complete Guide-Book, the best description of the Fair yet given—poetic, beautiful, accurate. It describes the inauguration ceremonies, gives the director-general's address, the efforts to close the Fair Sundays and the triumph of the Sunday-openers; describes the various buildings and what they contain, and is, all in all, the very best picture of the Fair that can be painted with a pen.

ILLUSTRATED.

A MAP OF JACKSON PARK, enabling the visitor to make his way around, and the stay-at-home to see where he went.

A BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF THE FAIR, enabling one to comprehend at a glance the magnitude of the Exposition, the greatest ever known to the present time.

RELIGION A CURSE, RELIGION A DISEASE, RELIGION A LIE.

By Samuel P. Putnam.

Dedicated to the American Congress, of 1892. which for the sake of Religion, Stabbed Liberty to the Heart.

A work burning with indignation inspired by the Congressional act closing the World's Fair on Sunday—an act which practically united the government and the Christian church.

To which is added Mr. Putnam's address delivered before the Columbian Exposition Committee of the House of Representatives against Sunday closing.

Also the following Essays and Poems by Mr. Putnam, which have never before been put in book form: Orthodoxy; Freethought; Man, Not God (written for a Paine anniversary); The Statue of Liberty and Thomas Paine; a poem written for the opening exercises of the Silverton, Ore., Freethought Hall; Death and Life; The Golden Age; Shut the Door (a poem on the closing of the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia, in 1876).

The main essay in this work is one of the strongest arraignments ever made of the religion which cramps and fetters the minds of the people of this country. It should be distributed widely. It has been commended in the highest terms as it appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER and we hope every reader will buy a copy to lend his neighbor and arouse thought.

Price 25 cents; Five copies for $1.

New Publications.

Unless otherwise specified, all publications noticed here can be had of THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY, at the price named.

"The Bible Inquirer" being Number 36 of "The Truth Seeker Library," is a pamphlet to go along with John Peck's "Christian Absurdities," "Thomas Paine Vindicated," by Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, "The Mistakes of Moses," by the same author, and a whole catalog of works having the same general drift. The pamphlet here noticed brings together more than one hundred instances of alleged contradiction, discrepancy, inconsistency, and opposition of doctrin, from the Jewish and Christian scriptures, the answers to most of which might safely be intrusted to an intelligent Sunday-school pupil of sixteen. The name of the author is not given. He says in his introduction that it is the result of a diligent obedience to the command of Christ himself to search the scriptures, and of a desire to benefit and enlighten mankind. New York, Truth Seeker Company.—Buffalo Express.

WOMAN: FOUR CENTURIES OF PROGRESS. By Susan H. Wixon. New York, Truth Seeker Company, 34 pp., 10 cents.

Susan H. Wixon is the editor of the Children's Corner of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and author of various Freethought works. The above mentioned pamphlet is a reprint of her lecture at the Chicago Freethought Congress, and is very interesting reading for Freethinkers and friends of progress.

THUMBSCREW AND RACK. By Geo. E. Macdonald. Illustrated. 24 pp. New York, Truth Seeker Company. 10 cts.

Mr. George E. Macdonald has here made a choice collection of ecclesiastic flowers gathered in the Nuremberg and other inquisitorial collections of implements of torture, and has succeeded in producing a little work for which he, in the name of humanity and progress, deserves thanks. The little work is interestingly written and splendidly illustrated.

THE BIBLE INQUIRER. A key to Bible investigation. Containing 148 propositions. Fourth edition. New York, Truth Seeker Company. 56 pp., 25 cents.

From the wonderful book of oracles, which the Protestants regard as the source, and the Catholics as one of the sources of revealed religion, the author has confined himself to one hundred and forty-eight contradictions which he, among many others, has come across by reading it. This book is of great value to the Bible student, because it givs not alone the chapter and verse of these self-contradictions, but reproduces these passages in full, so that the hurried reader is not condemned to a long search before he finds the antidote to one or another unhealthful passage.

THE CREATION OF GOD. By Dr. Jacob Hartman. New York, Truth Seeker Company. 432 pp. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.

A rare conglomerate of biblical criticism and positiv natural science. The first chapter deals with the formation of the earth from a cosmic, geologic, and chemic standpoint. The following eleven chapters contain a very interesting, able, rational, and critical history of Judaism and Christianity, and the last fourteen chapters are devoted to the natural sciences of biology, physiology, chemistry, ethics, and natural philosophy. The style is the popular scientific. The book is worthy an earnest perusal by every layman, for it contains, besides the results of rational criticism, a rich treasury of positiv knowledge.

HAND-BOOK OF FREETHOUGHT. Containing in condensed and systematized form a vast amount of evidence against the superstitious doctrins of Christianity. Selected by W. S. Bell. New York, Truth Seeker Company. 384 pp., paper, 50 cents, cloth, $1.

This work is a compendium by the critic of the fundamental doctrins of the Christian church, and arrayed under the following headings: Creation, Prophecies, Miracles, Love of Mankind, Jesus's Code of Morals, Resurrection Evangelics, The Fathers of the Church, Inspiration, Contradiction in the Bible, The Devil, The Soul, Theology, Sabbath, Slavery, Hell, Persecutions, Temperance, Atheism, Agnosticism. The work is not exhaustiv, but uncommonly rich in quotations from the best authorities of ancient and modern times. A very interesting work.

THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS. An Agnostic's view. By Don Allen. Truth Seeker Company. 161 pp., 1893. Cloth 75 cents; paper 40 cents.

Don Allen is a pseudonym. The internal evidence that Don Allen is identical with Colonel Ingersoll is overwhelming. The diction, the arguments, and the nearly unassailable weaving together of circumstantial evidence that no one but Pilate himself could hav secretly spirited away Christ's body, the inquiry into the trustworthiness of contemporaneous and late sources of information, the annihilation of the smooth-tongued, holy Augustine, all this and much more testify that the author is a keen student of law and could hardly be other than Robert Ingersoll. This book, like all others that hav come from his pen, makes interesting and fascinating reading and deserves a prominent place in the library of every Freethinker.—Milwaukee Freidenker.

["Don Allen" may congratulate himself that he has a style which a good critic mistakes for that of Colonel Ingersoll, and his work is a fine one, but he is not the orator whom the Freidenker suspects him to be. Mr. Boppe must guess again.—ED. T. S.]

THE CONFLICT BETWEEN MENTAL SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY.

By EDGAR C. BEALL, M.D.,

with a preface by

R. G. INGERSOLL.

This is the only work of its kind in the literature of Freethought. Its arguments are based upon scientific phrenology, and appeal directly to the reader's sense of logic and love of justice. It is eloquent as well as convincing.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A Nineteenth Century Novel.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price, 25 cents. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Col. R. G. Ingersoll's ARGUMENT

IN THE

Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,

At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

How To Preserve Health.

By LOUIS BARKAN, M.D.

Fordyce Barker, M.D., Professor Bellevue Medical College says of it, writing to the author: "I regard your book as the most sound, sensible, and useful book on the topics which it discusses that I hav met with. I wish it could be in the hands of every intelligent head of a family. I am particucularly pleased with one feature of it that it does not profess to teach dosing and drugging. I congratulate you on the wisdom and success of this effort."

AT a salon in Paris some years ago the Sieur d'Aimerie was one of a group to whom he was imparting an account of his pedigree, which he claimed was derived from the Pharaohs of Egypt. Just then, the late Baron de Rothschild approached the group, and one of its members called out, "Baron, come and let me make you acquainted with the Sieur d'Aimerie. He comes of Pharaonic stock, and you ought to know each other." "Yes," said the baron, bowing gravely, and addressing d'Aimerie, "I believe our families had some transactions in times past." "Yes," rejoined d'Aimerie, "we hav a record that your people when leaving the country borrowed a considerable amount of jewelry of my people, for which I should now like to be repaid with interest." "I remember the transaction," said Rothschild, "but the account was settled at due date. Your fathers received a check on the Bank of the Red Sea."—Ex.

A WELL-KNOWN Lanarkshire minister of the old school, recently deceased, was so sensitiv to any suspicion of plagiarism that he never allowed himself to make the slightest quotation to the Lord without furnishing the said Lord with his authority. He was accustomed to assemble his household every morning for family worship, and on one occasion he commenced his devotions thus: "O Lord, we heartily thank thee that we hav been awakened from the sleep which a writer in the Edinburgh Review has called the image of death." It was evidently taken for granted that the Lord is a reader of the Edinburgh Review. And a student prayed that the Lord would destroy "him that had the power of death," went on with the quotation, and added, "this is the devil." His professor, looking gravely at him, said: "Do you not think that the Lord will know whom you mean?" This student was outdone by an "unsophisticated brother." This brother, after pleading for the fulfilment of a promis, quoted chapter and verse, and then added, "Revised version, Lord."—Salad n.

THE CHEMISTRY OF BELIEF.

And these signs shall follow them that believe. . . . Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world.—CHRIST.

If credence awaited desire,
And wishing extinguished dubiety,
The parsons might prate about fire
With some little show of propriety.

For many would gladly receive
The soothing old syrup of piety,
If wishing could make them believe
The Bible's conflicting variety.

To doubt is absurd, if the will
Makes flat contradictories credible,
Resulting in magical skill,
And the power to make deadly things edible.

O skeptic, just think of the gain!
The Lord, in his speech valedictory,
Said Christians would always obtain
O'er poisons and devils the victory.

Said Jesus: Believers shall cure
Diseases at each opportunity,
And take, while the earth shall endure,
All poisonous drinks with impunity.

A real believer can drink
With safety and perfect propriety,
Since potions can ne'er make him blind,
Nor damage his health or sobriety.

It follows, as all must allow—
Save those of the shamming fraternity—
That faith makes us poison-proof now,
And fire-proof throughout all eternity.

A Christian, if honest and true,
Might swallow a quart of petroleum;
No matter, no harm would ensue,
Says Christ—unobscured by a scholium.

Away, then, with logic and brains!
Just think of the boon to society,
When cancers, and poisons, and pains
Are conquered by credulous piety!

Jehovah, Ghost, Devil, and Son!
Co-auto-genetic Quarternity!
O multiple, quadrified one!
O inter-paternal fraternity!

These verses are likely to be
The means—through their fitting vacuity—
Of leading "inquirers" to thee,
O shadow of human fatuity.

IT seems to me that the bane of our country is a profession of faith either with no basis of real belief, or with no proper examination of the grounds on which the creed is supposed to rest.—James Russell Lowell.

I AM a Baptist, and I say that the man who would establish a religious qualification for citizenship or office under this government or any other government is as unfit for membership in a Baptist church as Judas Iscariot was for the apostleship. —Rev. J. B. Hawthorne.

IT can do trnth no service to blink the fact, known to all who hav the most ordinary acquaintance with literary history, that a large portion of the noblest and most valuable moral teaching has been the work not only of men who did not know, but of men who knew and rejected, the Christian faith.—J. S. Mill.

IT is impossible that the sin of one man can be imposed upon another. It is by a fiction not to be realized by the mind that the transference is to be made. Nor can blood of any sort wipe away sin. Sin has to be repented of and turned from and can be got rid of in no other manner. —Judge Thomas Lumsden Strange.

Is it not manifest that there must exist in our midst an immense amount of misery which is a normal state of misconduct, and ought not to be dissociated from it? There is a notion always more or less prevalent and just now vociferously expressed, that all social suffering is removable, and that it is the duty of somebody or other to remove it. Both these beliefs are false.—Herbert Spencer.

YOU are finally saved by what you possess in yourself, not by what others possess for you, or, possessing, are willing to grant you on loan at interest. But the desiderata are men and women to whom courage and spontaneity are every-day habits of life—who do not qualify, who do not apologize—who love to get to roots and see a principle in full play rather than to finger and toy with the leafage of the tree or with the fringe of the garment.—Horace L. Traubel.

THE universal idea of the interposition of a personal agency in the most common concerns of every-day life, and the most ordinary natural processes, inherited by the European, has become gradually discarded. As science by successiv efforts explains the sequence and changes in natural phenomena, so mysterious to ignorance, the idea of personal agency becomes gradually eliminated, and driven further beyond the the regions of direct observation and experience. And, as it escapes ordinary attention, the idea of a supernaturalism slowly fades from the recollection and ceases to materially influence conduct.—Westminster Review.

"THERE is too much pain in the world," said Charles Darwin, who knew what he was talking about, and always expressed himself with moderation. In the moral world, pain becomes evil; and the problem of evil has ever been the crux of Theism. It cannot be solved on Theistic grounds, and accordingly it has to be explained away. Pain, we are told, is the great agent in our development; in the ethical sphere, it is the "purifying fire," which purges the gold in us from its dross. All of which sounds very pretty in a lecture, and looks very pretty in a book; but is apt to excite digust when a man is suffering from incurable cancer, or utter destitution in the midst of plenty; or when a mother stands over the corpse of her child, mangled in some terrible accident, or burnt to a cinder in a fatal fire.—G. W. Foote.

TENNYSON was some one's monument; the dolichocephalic man away back in the æons, who laid the foundation-stone of Huxley, founded a monumental column to which the pyramid of Cephrenes is a mere Jonah's gourd; he, away back in the polæolithic period, who, in partnership with Janet, habilimented in a necklace of shells, laid the raw potencies of Shakspere bade for eternity. See you a man of strong thought and strenuous deed? He is someone's monument. Behold you the healthy, "hilty-skilty lassie," her eye of the tint of the blue-bell, her lip that of the rose, flitting over the broomy braes like a fairy, while the sunbeams play at hide-and-seek in her wind-ravished hair? She is someone's monument; and more lovely than the lithest and whitest marble angel that ever guarded the gate of a tomb. —Saladin.

THE HOLY CROSS SERIES.

The Popes and Their Doings. Biographical sketches of the most noted of these vicars of Christ and vicegerents of God, showing what they have done, and what kind of men they were. It contains very plain statements, in very unvarnished language, and the unmasking is complete, proving them to have been cruel, intriguing, and licentious men. Considering the rapid growth of Catholicism in this country, this book cannot be too widely disseminated. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Awful Disclosures of Maria Monk, as exhibited in a narrative of her sufferings during her residence of five years as a novice, and two years as a black nun, in the Hotel Dieu Nunnery, at Montreal. Perhaps not any anti Catholic book published has created more excitement, and had such a circulation as this work. To counteract its effects the Catholics circulated a story that Maria Monk was "no better than she should be," but investigation disclosed that her "child of shame" was none other than the child of her priest-seducer Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth 75 cents.

Auricular Confession and Popish Nunneries. By Wm. Hogan, for twenty-five years a confessing priest. A revelation of the licentious practices of the priests and nuns in these religious brothels. There is no question that Ex priest Hogan knew the truth of the tales of vice, seduction, and infanticide he gives in this volume, and equally there is no question that if the people generally knew of them, Catholicism would not be given the vast amounts of money now allowed it by our various city governments. Price, paper, 50 cents, cloth 75 cents.

The Priest in Absolution. A Review of the system of auricular confession, including copious extracts from the "Confessional Unmasked," from the "Master Key to Popery," etc. The work is a protest against and an appeal to every American citizen to examine carefully and thoughtfully a religious system so invasive of privacy, so powerful for evil in licentious hands, so fraught with danger to female modesty, to the ingenuous openness of youth, and to the freedom of thought, speech and action. CONWAY'S EDITION

THE WRITINGS OF THOMAS PAINE.

COLLECTED, EDITED, AND CHRONOLOGICALLY ARRANGED

By MONCURE DANIEL CONWAY.

Author of "The Life of Thomas Paine," "Omitted Chapters of History Disclosed in the Life and Papers of Edmund Randolph," etc.

Four Volumes, Royal Octavo, Gilt Tops, Uniform with the Editor's "Life of Paine." Price per Volume, $2.50.

An edition of one hundred and fifty numbered copies bound in half leather, gilt tops, uniform with the limited editions of "The Writings of Washington," "The Writings of Jefferson," etc. Price, per volume, $4.

For the general reader the $3 edition of Paine's works is sufficient, as it contains all of his writings upon which his fame substantially rests. But for those who desire to go deeper into the subject of the man and polemic we can most unreservedly commend the "Life of Paine" by Mr Conway, and this edition of Paine's works edited by him It is the fullest that we are likely to have, and the student of history, and particularly the writer, should have it upon his shelves.

The work will consist of four volumes, and will be arranged chronologically. The cause of America, as Paine said, made him an author, and the first volume will cover the period of the American Revolution, beginning with the year 1774. It will therefore open with Paine's anti-slavery essay, and his philosophical or moral essays, while editing the Pennsylvania Magazine; these being followed by the great revolutionary, political, and controversial pamphlets which made such a profound impression on the country.

The second volume will consist mainly of the "Rights of Man," and pamphlets relating to English politics, but will also contain certain papers on French affairs.

The third and fourth volumes will consist mainly of Paine's religious writings, but will also contain some essays relating to American affairs, written in his last years. At the close will be given Paine's poems.

The first volume is now ready for delivery, and the others will follow soon. Orders for the whole set will be taken and filled as the volumes appear, or the volumes can be purchased separately. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER CO., 28 Lafayette Place, New York.

The question of the taxation of church property should be kept before the New York Constitutional Convention in every possible way. We cannot afford to let this opportunity to establish equity in taxation be fruitless through the neglect of our share of the work. The New York section of the Freethought Letter-Writing Corps will, as usual, write to members of the committees likely to consider this subject. Write each week to those not previously addressed by you. Here is a full list of the committeemen:

We hope that every member of the Freethought Letter-Writing Corps wrote last week to Ginn & Co., of Boston, in regard to the scheme of the Covenanters to hav published school books containing matter in advocacy of Sabbath observance. This week the corps will write to Potter & Co., of Philadelphia, a school-book firm whose representativ "could see no objection" to the plot. We reprint the synopsis of the report made to the Presbytery by the committee "To Secure the Introduction of Literature on Sabbath Observance into School Books":

"Dr. H. H. George · · · reported that he had corresponded with three leading school-book publishers; viz.: Ginn & Co., Boston; Potter & Co., Philadelphia, and the American Book Company, New York. The first mentioned thought it a grand idea, and would like to hav the matter continued, and suggested that some sample manuscripts be prepared and submitted to the company. The second, or representativ of the Potter & Co. firm, could see no objection to it, and would be quite willing to consider it further. The American Book Company did not know that it would be expedient. They were aiming to meet any public demand in the line of school books, but had not known of any demand in the direction of Sabbath literature for such books. The committee deems it advisable to take further steps to prepare some discussion of the subject of the Sabbath in a graded series to suit the different school readers, and also a more analytic discussion of the subject for the text-book on physiology, and hav them submitted to these and other book firms."

Mr. Putnam tells us about his first lectures on this trip and we judge that he is encouraged by the reception which was accorded him in Michigan. This is hot weather for campaigning, and everything, almost, is against our earnest champion. The very dull times will inevitably greatly lessen the number of his engagements and the strike against the Pullman Company will render these times still duller, besides probably seriously interfering with his freedom of locomotion. Under these circumstances we shall be glad if our subscribers and others will conspire with us in making up an extra large list of orders for "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," so that we can send the Secular Pilgrim an inspiring message next week. Our offer of THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year (old and new subscribers) and "Four Hundred Years" for $6.50 still stands, while the book alone costs $5. These are for cash orders. Send in your names at once and they will get into the great book. The following subscriptions hav been received since the last acknowledgment was made:

Statesmen and Sunday Statutes.

When we prepared the circular letter on the Sunday bills we did not harbor the delusion that a very large number of our Senators and Representativs would place themselvs on record in THE TRUTH SEEKER, but we did think that we should get more than thirteen answers from nearly four hundred and fifty men. It seems, however, that not only those who favor the secular idea of government, but those also who are willing to grant privileges to the church, do not wish to be quoted. Why men who hav clear-cut views on this subject should shrink from letting their constituents know what they are is reasonably plain, and illustrates anew the truth that votes make "cowards of us all." It is not "conscience" nowadays; universal suffrage has its beneficent uses, but it has played havoc with the backbones of lawmakers. They realize that numbers, not intelligence, count at the polls, and the Representativ who knows or believes that the electorate of his district is made up of men who think and of men who only think they think, in the ratio of one of the former to ten of the latter, must be a man of extraordinary probity and courage if he says much about those convictions of his which he has reason to apprehend are not acceptable to the majority. And even the minority is dangerous in a close district; it may be able to turn the scales against one who has the sympathy, on some particular question, of the great majority of the voters, but many of whom cannot support him because they are the adherents of another political party or of other parties. So it comes to pass that our national legislators dare not say what they think about the pending Sunday bills, even when they feel that they are sustained by the popular opinion of their sections; "there is many a slip" between the hustings and the Capitol, and a handful of dissatisfied sovereigns may so combine with the opposition as to be able to relegate the over-frank "savior of his country" to the shades of private life.

Upon just how many diverse institutions, principles, laws, etc., "the perpetuity of this government depends" we are not informed, but Representativ Latimer says there is no hope for the nation if Sunday is not observed, and the last issue of the Voice asserts just as solemnly that we must kill the liquor business or it will kill the state. We confess that we think it is not nearly so important that Sunday be set apart entirely for the use of the priest as it is that liberty shall be respected, justice enforced, and comradeship prevail on all the days of the week. We are not so very particular whether our neighbors go to church, to the baseball game, set type on or sell the Sunday and other newspapers, visit the country, gather their harvests, read in the public library, or remain in their own homes. What is essential is that they are happy in minding their own business. We want them to respect our and one another's rights, and we want them to do this not only on Sunday but on the six so-called week-days. We are not especially amused or edified by the spectacle of a man who from Monday morning to Saturday night is a rascal in his shop or office and then on Sunday goes to church with a sanctimonious face, after having first closed the doors and gates of all places of recreation and instruction, locked the railway switches, stopped the motors in the power houses of the electric and cable lines, and set a policeman in front of our place of business to prevent us from accommodating ourselvs and our would-be patrons. Mr. Latimer should return to his farm and devote a part of his spare time to the study of nature's processes. Possibly he may be able to invent some device whereby his cotton, corn, grass, yams, and peanuts will help perpetuate our government by "the proper observance of the Sabbath day." So long as they sacrilegiously grow on the blessed Sunday, it is just conceivable that "God" is not worrying so very anxiously about this business.

Representativ Harter is altogether too able a man to be fooled by the cant about a law-enforced "rest" day and we hav heretofore esteemed him as too honest to attempt to fool others with that transparent humbug. He says that he is a Lutheran and keeps "what is known as the Sabbath," by which he is supposed to mean Sunday. We hav his assurance that he has no wish to compel others to share his views. How could he compel others to think as he thinks? Does he believe that it is possible to legislate beliefs into men's brains? He probably means to say that he does not wish to force others to observe the same day that he does. Yet he declares that he would establish a day of "rest." Would not this result in compelling "others by law" to conform their actions to his desire? What natural or constitutional right has he to dictate to his fellow-citizens the times of rest or labor? Why should their recreation on one day of the week be interfered with by the state on the ground that Michael D. Harter knows better than they what is good for them? Where does he get his peculiar and paramount authority? To the citizen who is denied the opportunity to attend to his legitimate business on Sunday, what difference does it make whether the meddler is the priest or the politician? In fact, the priest is helpless without the assistance of the politician, and when the latter gives the former the statute he wants, is not the law, to all practical intents and purposes, the priest's law, and will it not enforce the observance of a religious Sunday? The priest wishes to hav work and amusement on Sunday forbidden. If the legislators forbid them, then the priest has obtained what he wanted, and he does not care the snap of his finger whether the law that has gratified his desire was adopted ostensibly in the name of rest or of worship; it was actually in his interest, which is, for him, the only consideration of any importance. And the oppression under the law is not one iota less painful if "rest" was the god in whose name it was enacted. It is positivly childish to split hairs in the way Mr. Harter has done.

If the Ohio Representativ is not willing to trust to the good sense and self-interest of the people to select such periods of rest and recreation as they would like, or if he thinks that grasping employers would giv employees no rest in the absence of law, why is he not content to act upon our rational suggestion that there be secured to all who desire it one day's rest each week, leaving to the individuals immediately concerned the choice of the day? We hav placed unanswerable arguments in support of this idea before him in "Congress and Sunday Laws," and we again call his attention to the fact that it is perfectly feasible to giv to all a weekly rest day, if they wish it, without punishing or threatening to punish, any man or woman for engaging in honest work or seeking recreation and instruction on Sunday. Let us kick out Cant and be sensible.

We regret that Representativ Griffin is so uncertain as to the action he "may be induced to take when the question becomes a practical one." The debates in Congress and the press during the struggle over the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday should hav furnished every member of the House and Senate with all the "light" needed. Since that contest closed the work of education has not been suffered to languish and there is no reason why so simple, so clear, so self-evident a proposition as this, that the citizen's time on Sunday is rightfully his own as surely as it is on Monday or Saturday, should require a protracted discussion to force recognition and acceptance.

General Wheeler is evidently trying to ride two horses at the same time. Only the best performers can do that feat successfully and we are apprehensiv that the Alabamian will hav a bad fall if he does not curb his equestrian ambition. How he can, "on general principles," "support a bill tending to foster and encourage religion," while he realizes that "laws which fetter individual liberty and bring religion into the domain of legislation are of doubtful utility," he does not attempt to explain, quite possibly because he sees that the two positions can not be reconciled. How does General Wheeler propose to adopt a law intended "to foster and encourage religion" and yet avoid bringing "religion into the domain of legislation"? The notion is ridiculous. "On general principles" no law-maker has the slightest shadow of moral or constitutional right to foster and encourage religion by law, nor to oppress and discourage it. His only duty in the premises is to keep his official hands off religion and attend strictly to his business as a civil legislator. We cannot understand why General Wheeler needs at this late day to be told this. But it is evident that he requires the instruction.

Representativ Grady talks well along noncommittal lines. It is to be regretted that he did not say specifically what his attitude is toward the pending Sunday statutes. To be sure, he speaks of the Sunday observance bill as one of the "logical outgrowths" of the "hateful tree" of "imperialism and paternalism," but this does not signify, for he said the same thing of the Anti-option bill, and yet on June 23d he voted for that identical bill. He has also recently introduced in the House a bill to regulate the quality and fix the price of gas in the District of Columbia. Both of these acts go to show that his generalizations about paternalism, including Sunday legislation, are to be taken with several grains of allowance.

There is no doubt about the position of Representativs Cummings, Richardson, Hayes, Bowers, and Maguire, but Senators Peffer and McMillan keep their secrets well, as do the three hundred and forty-seven Representativs and eighty-three Senators who do not respond. This is an indication not ominous of the immediate defeat of the Sabbatarians. It shows that the national legislators are waiting to see which side can make the most noise. In the World's Fair conflict the advocates of repression, by means of fictitious petitions, created the impression that they were an overwhelming majority of the people. But that despicable trick has been so thoroughly exposed that it is not probable that the theocrats can soon again so completely dupe even the American Congress. If Freethinkers keep their eyes open and their energies in full play the current theocracyward may eventually be turned back upon itself.

In this connection it may not be unprofitable to again giv some of the facts relating to the petitions sent to Congress in reference to the Sunday-closing of the World's Fair. The actual number of petitioners calling for the closing of the Fair on Sunday was 315,154; those protesting against closing numbered 300,000. The Sundayites claimed that 40,000,000 people had asked for Sunday closing; they attempted to substantiate this claim by offering to Congress petitions said to number 25,509,132. Here are a few samples of their rascality: Michigan has a population of 2,093,896; it was represented to hav sent 4,096,240 petitions. The population of Ohio is 3,672,316; they said she sent 4,104,396 petitions. Pennsylvania's inhabitants number 5,258,014; the Sundayite petitions were pretended to bear the names of or to represent 15,552,473 people? Think of it! If every man, woman, and child, including new-born babes, in these three states had asked for Sunday closing the petitioners would hav been but 11,024,226. According to the good Sabbatarians 23,753,109 names were secured in those states. In other words, there were 12,728,883 more alleged signatures or votes for Sunday closing than there were people of all ages in the states named. How this was done was told by an honest Presbyterian minister, Rev. Mr. Cross, to a committee of Congress, as follows:

"MR. CHAIRMAN AND GENTLEMEN OF THE COMMITTEE: The real object of my being here to speak a word is in favor of intellectual honesty on the part of the orthodox churches. I am a minister of an orthodox church. I notice in my territory that these church petitions are exceedingly delusiv as to the number of those that sign them or vote for them. Now, for example, in one instance in our state the Presbyterians passed a resolution, saying that we represent so many, aggregating a certain membership; and then the Christian Endeavor Society, composed of many of the same church-members alluded to by that Presbyterian church, will pass a like resolution and say we represent fifty, seventy, or one hundred members. And then it will be brought before the Sunday-school. And many of the persons who are counted as voting for the resolutions will hav been counted three, four, or five times; and it is almost on the principle of voting early and often, which is so much opposed in secular politics. I am a witness to this fact: There was one petition claiming to represent eighty church-members that signed the petition to Congress, but they were not present at all. It was at a Sunday-school, and the vote was taken by the Sunday-school superintendent, and there were children voted for these resolutions that were not old enough to know whether the expression 'World's Fair' meant the pretty girls in the next pew or the Columbian Exposition in Chicago."

Will these facts furnish "new light" for Representativ Griffin and his equally or more undecided fellow legislators?

Peculiar Arguments for Church Exemption.

When we made up the symposium on church taxation we overlooked one reply we had received, a letter from the treasurer of Livingston county. It follows this:

"GENESEO, N. Y., May 27, 1894.

"E. M. MACDONALD: Replying to the questions propounded, I would say: 1. In my judgment church property should not be taxed. 2. I think the exemption thereof amounts practically to an appropriation from the state, and on no other theory would the exemption be tolerated. So long as the practice is universal, and so long as the national quartet of words, 'In God we trust,' is placed upon our coins; and so long as the state, through a majority of its individuals, believes that any church doctrin minimizes bad citizenship, and tends to promote good citizenship, then the exemption is justified and meets with my approval.

"Yours truly, JAS. B. HAMPTON."

Just why the exemption of church property from taxation should be tolerated only on the ground that it is really an appropriation from the state for the support of religion Mr. Hampton does not state. We, who read the Constitution carefully and are familiar with the theory of our government, would say without hesitation that exemption could be tolerated on any other ground more readily than on this which Mr. Hampton declares is the only one which sanctions it. What is his idea regarding the relations of church and state? If he really believes, as his words indicate, that the government is justified in voting money for the sustainment of religious institutions, where would he stop? What are his reasons for believing that the majority may rightfully take the money of the minority for the propagation of the theological dogmas of that majority? What are constitutions for if not to preserve the reserved rights of the otherwise helpless minority? We wish to remind the gentleman that the practice is not universal, and that, if it were, that fact would not warrant its own continuance. Hundreds of wrongs and crimes which Treasurer Hampton would not for a moment defend hav, at one time and another, been universally accepted as natural and right. The presence of "In God We Trust" on our coins does not affect the question of church taxation one way or the other. The motto has no business there, as Mr. Hampton ought to know.

It is evident that our correspondent would look with complacency upon the exemption from taxation of the property of any one church which the majority of the citizens of the county or state thought promotiv of good citizenship. If the majority of the people of Pennsylvania should reach the conclusion that the Presbyterian church is the only one which can exert such an educativ power, they would be justified, if Mr. Hampton's reasoning is sound, in exempting the property of that church from taxation, and levying an additional tax upon all other churches in the state. If the majority of the people of this state had a similar opinion concerning the Catholic church, its property would be exempted, and that of other churches and of the citizens generally would be double-loaded. Will Mr. Hampton stand by the logic of his own argument?

A Missionary Scheme.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has recently been doing, with the generous aid of its friends, a great deal of political missionary work. We hav given away thousands of the "Church Property" pamphlet, and it is doing its work, in this state particularly. We hav also given away thousands of arguments against the proposed national Sunday laws. Besides these, more thousands of TRUTH SEEKERS hav been scattered broadcast over the land.

With the advent of hot weather the political bodies will soon adjourn, but the people of the country will remain in session right along. And they are of not less importance than the politicians, and we want to devote a little attention to them.

Probably no one book has made more converts to common sense and won more people away from superstition than Paine's "Age of Reason." It is a book, as Colonel Ingersoll says, that furnishes an immense amount of food for thought. It is written for the average mind, and is a straightforward, honest investigation of the Bible and of the Christian system. It has liberalized us all. It puts arguments in the mouths of the people; it puts the church on the defensiv; it enables somebody in every village to corner the parson. It has never been "answered" and never can be.

What ought to be done, and what we propose to do, is to scatter this book broadcast—to giv and to hav given away thousands of them among the people. Every church-member that any Freethinker knows ought to hav one. It will do that church-member good, even if his wife burns it. He will read a few pages in it at least before she gets hold of it. But perhaps she too will read it. That book in a family is bound to do good—an immense amount. It has liberalized thousands and will liberalize thousands more. That book started THE TRUTH SEEKER, for from reading it D. M. Bennett, whom we all loved when living, and whose memory we now honor, became a Liberal. Previously he was a rigid churchman. There are more like him in the country, and it is they we ought to reach.

Our proposition is for every reader of this paper to send us the names and addresses of EIGHT of his Christian acquaintances and ONE DOLLAR, and we will mail each of them a copy of Paine's "AGE OF REASON."

If you don't know eight Christians you care enough about to convert, name those whom you do want to convert, send the dollar, and we will mail the remainder to some editor or public man or preacher worth saving.

In this way public opinion can be made and the church undermined. A few Freethinkers in a community can club together and convert a whole congregation, leaving the minister high and dry in his pulpit. Or they can send us the funds and we will make the selection of the target and take the responsibility of the work. What we want is to scatter the book among the people and hav it read.

Remember, we do all the work—all we ask is the names and addresses and means to mail the book. Surely everybody can help in this and make thousands of Freethinkers. Don't select the names of indifferentists, but those of good church people, with a preference for those who hav the capacity to think if they only are steered in the right direction.

Christians Attack Their Own Fetich.

It is peculiarly unfortunate for the champions of Christianity that several of the persecutions instituted under the Comstock postal statutes hav been against men and women whose chief or only offense was that they had sent through the mails extracts from God's own and only sacred book. The latest victim of the rash zeal of the Lord's political servant is our aged friend, Mr. J. B. Wise, of Clay Center, Kansas. Senators Vest and Gorman wanted the anti-lottery laws so doctored that they would not interfere with gambling in churches; it would appear that the laws against obscene literature should plainly exempt the Bible, as otherwise hot-headed United States marshals are likely to call attention to the character of the scriptures in a way that cannot but be destructiv of popular reverence for that more or less ancient work.

These letters are self-explanatory:

"CLAY CENTER, KAN., June 26, 1894.

"EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed you will find a letter from J. B. Wise, with whom you are more or less acquainted, as he is the distributor of Freethought literature in these parts. For some time he carried on a correspondence by letter with the Rev. Vennum. Each was trying to convert the other, and of course quoted scripture. I hav read one or two of Vennum's letters, and advised Mr. Wise to quit, as it was doing no good; he promised to do so, but wound up by quoting the twelfth verse of the the thirty-sixth chapter of Isaiah on a postal card, without comment. The reason he used a card was that, being very poor, a cripple with only one arm; also crippled in his chances of making a living because he is a Liberal, he at the time was out of funds; no stamps or stationery, but happening to hav a postal card, he used it, thinking no harm. Now about two months ago a postal inspector came to my place, where Wise happened to be that day, and asked if he wrote the card. 'Yes,' replied Wise, and the inspector asked the reason why. He was told and then left. We thought the matter had dropped, hearing no more of it for so long a time. But about the 22d of this month Wise disappeared, and by accident I heard about it three or four days afterward, but could not find out where he was until I heard from Sheriff Neeley, of Topeka, and Sheriff Rothenberger, of Leavenworth, having previously written to them. Mr. Wise's letter will explain the rest. I am now going to try to bail him out if it is possible for me to do so. I hope that you will giv this publicity and giv us what advice you can as to defending him, and thus confer a favor on your Liberal friend, GEORGE HARRISON."

Here is Mr. Wise's letter written from the Leavenworth jail:

"LEAVENWORTH, KAN., June 24, 1894.

"MR. HARRISON, Dear Friend: Your kind and welcome letter received to-day. I was promised a speedy hearing by the United States marshal from Topeka (the man who brought me to this place), but as yet I hav had not even a hearing, and it seems I can get no satisfaction from anyone—not even the United States Marshal Neeley or the United States District Attorney Perry—and what to do I do not know. This I do know: I am now in the Leavenworth jail and hav been ever since Saturday noon, June 16, and hav spent half of that time in a locked cell, which is anything but pleasant, especially this hot weather. I wrote day before yesterday to friend Tebbe in regard to my case, as I could get no hearing and no satisfaction whatever in regard to it, and that I would like very much indeed if it suited him to come and see about it. I was going to come and see you before the United States marshal and I started from Clay Center, but I did not hav the time, as I had to start with him directly after he had me arrested, in order to take that evening freight train east. Your true friend,

"J. B. WISE,
"Leavenworth, Kan. (Care of Sheriff.)"

There are some rulings from the office of the assistant attorney-general, who decides law questions for the post-office department, which fully cover the case of Mr. Wise. In April, 1891, Mr. B. C. Murray, editor of the Sunday Gazetteer of Denison, Texas, purchased a copy of the Bible and then sat down and wrote a long letter to his local postmaster, telling him that he had a book which he wished to send through the mails and calling his attention to the postal statutes against sending obscene literature by post, and also to Mr. Wanamaker's report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1890, quoting from the statutes and the report. Mr. Murray also referred the postmaster to a large number of passages in the Bible and asked him if he could transmit by mail the book containing such matter. Mr. Dougherty, the postmaster, wrote at once to the department at Washington, stating the question, and he received the following reply, which the reader will perceive was very promptly forthcoming:

"[COPY.]
"DICTATED.

"JAMES N. TYNER,
"Assistant Attorney-General.
"OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT ATTORNEY-GENERAL
"FOR THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
"April 24, 1891.

"C T. DOUGHERTY, Postmaster, Denison, Tex.:

"Sir: In your letter of the 17th inst., you stated that Mr. C. B. Murray 'is anxious for a ruling from the department on the question he raises,' in a certain communication of his bearing date of the 18th inst., which was transmitted with your letter.

"The question that Mr. Murray raises is as to the mailability of the volume entitled 'Holy Bible.' I find no other question involved in his communication, and I think I do not misunderstand the full scope of the question, for he says: 'I hav a book which I would like to hav transmitted through the mails; but before mailing the same, I wish to be sure that, in doing so, I would not be violating the act of Congress passed March 3, 1873, and amended July 12, 1876.'

"If Mr. Murray should offer the Holy Bible for mailing, you can receive and deliver it at your office, or transmit it in the mails; for it is not believed in this department to come within the prohibitory clauses of the act referred to. The penalty portions of said statute are enforcible by the courts, and the question of his liability thereunder is a proper one to be submitted to the United States attorney.

"You may assure Mr. Murray that the mailability of the volume will not be questioned by the post-office department or by any postmaster.

"The volume sent with your communication is herein returned.

"Very respectfully, JAMES N. TYNER,
"Assistant Attorney-General."

About the same time Mr. M. W. St. John, of Cedar Falls, Iowa, left a copy of "The Holy Bible Abridged" with the postmaster of that city, with the request that he send it to the postmaster-general in order to ascertain if it was mailable. This is Mr. Tyner's reply:

"OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT ATTORNEY-GENERAL,
"WASHINGTON, D. C., April 10, 1891.

"S. B. HUMBERT, Postmaster, Cedar Falls, Ia.:

"Sir: With your letter of the 7th inst., addressed to the postmaster-general (which has been sent to me for reply), you submit a volume entitled 'The Holy Bible' (abridged), and inquire if your opinion that it is unmailable under the provisions of Section 380 Postal Laws and Regulations, would be concurred in by this department. I answer in the negativ. The volume is made up exclusivly of reproductions of chapters and verses from the Bible and we hav not progressed here to the extent of regarding that sacred book as obscene or indecent.

"If the volume referred to is offered to you for mailing, you should take it without question.

"Very respectfully,
"JAMES N. TYNER,
"Assistant Attorney-General.

"The volume is herewith returned."

Mr. Wise and a gentleman of the law who will probably act as his counsel hav been communicated with and we hope soon to hear of the former's release on bail, if not of his discharge after a preliminary examination before a United States commissioner. His only offense is sending by mail an extract from the Bible; if he is to be punished for this, what should be the fate of the pious publishers and dealers who repeat the transgression a million times?

Push the circulation of the "Church Property" pamphlet. Only fifteen cents for a brochure of one hundred pages. Ten copies for $1; fifty copies, $4.50; one hundred copies, $8; postage always prepaid.

We ask the indulgence of our readers in calling their attention to the advertisment on page 430, headed "At New Rochelle." It is of interest to all admirers of Thomas Paine, which means to all Freethinkers and Secularists.

"Whatever excites animal feeling or kindles carnal fires in the inner temple of the soul should be swept clean out of the prints admitted into our homes and handled by our sons and daughters. The churches hav this power, and they ought to exercise it at once."—New York Observer.

This is the death-knell of poetry and of all that is exalting in prose, of oratory and art. No more beautiful flowers in garden and conservatory, no zephyr-laden breezes from the Southlands, no more intoxicating perfumes from the orchards of May and the clover fields of June. Giv us, O apostles of the anti-natural, the lamentations of Jeremiah, the pictures of your Christ on the cross and of your medieval monks in their filth, the burning sands of the desert, and the odors of the charnel-house. You owe your very existence to "animal feeling," and you are therefore ashamed. We should be too if we were you, and we would hav ample cause to be.

We are glad to see that light is finding its way into some of the Catholic newspapers' editorial rooms. The Catholic Citizen has an article about the charities of that church and state aid therefor. It concludes with these words:

"And our numerous and starved charities are ever inclined to seek state funds; which fact is continually forcing us into politics after sanctimonious boodle. It is time that volunteer zeal herein be regulated."

The Western Watchman of St. Louis speaks out still more clearly and emphatically:

"The best policy is for us to conduct our own charities, pay as we go, and grow as we can without artificial forcing. · · · When sisters hav to lobby for the passage of bills, and court the favor of the great to influence legislation, God help the religious spirit among them! We would like that the announcement were made in clarion notes from the lakes to the gulf that the Catholics of the United States wanted no more state money. It would settle the miserable controversy once and forever."

When a majority of Catholics and Protestants get ready to act as Editor Phelan writes the church and state question, so far, at least, as the monetary side of it is concerned, will be settled in a hurry.

"Would Woman Suffrage Restrict Personal Liberty?" was the question discussed by the Sunrise Club at its last meeting. The query receives numerous illustrations. In the Independent Rev. C. Bradford, writing of "Equal Suffrage in Colorado," relates two incidents to dispose of the objection that the possession of the ballot by women would not change results, it being assumed that every woman would vote as her husband does, thus doubling the totals without displacing the usual majorities. In Aspen, the citizens' ticket bore the name of a man who, it was learned, had kept a saloon and dance hall in another town. Nothing is said of his fitness, otherwise, for the office. The women voters interested themselvs and secured his defeat, in face of the fact that his opponent "was personally very uncongenial and unpopular, though of upright morals." In the same town a woman was nominated on the other ticket. Let Mr. Bradford tell the story:

"She was the wife of the president of the 'Freethinkers' Club' of the town, and was accused of being of the same belief as her husband. She was nominated by the People's party for city treasurer, and some of the members of the church whose politics outweighed their religion supported her; but enough of the women interested themselvs in the case to secure her defeat by a majority of 150 for her opponent."

Rev. Austin Phelps, D.D., of Andover Theological Seminary, seems to be quite different from ordinary men of his profession. He can see facts and does not always refrain from letting the world know that he sees them. In a work on "English Style in Public Discourse," Rev. Mr. Phelps makes these candid admissions:

"Modern Infidelity is an intellectual giant in comparison with anything in the Infidel records of the past. It is to the Infidelity of history, in many respects, what the Copernican is to the Ptolemaic astronomy. It is learned in resources, shrewd in tactics, well-informed in the Christian argument, vigilant of its weak points, self-possessed in assurance, and, withal, morally earnest in spirit. It seeks, and not without fascinating reasons, to establish the ethics of the Bible without the God of the Bible. He must be a citizen of no mean city who shall cope successfully with such a foe. It is time to cease confounding Infidelity with depravity. We should hav done with the stories of Infidel death-beds. For the purposes for which they are commonly used, all pith has been taken out of them by the testimony of intelligent physicians. As argument for one thing or another they go for nothing."

That is pretty fair, and needs correction chiefly in regard to the alleged "ethics of the Bible." Dr. Phelps claims too much for that work. The Bible, in so far as it teaches ethics, but repeats the maxims that were current before it was written, except in a few instances, and what is new is generally impractical—much of the overrated "Sermon on the Mount," for example.

VERY RETICENT LAWMAKERS.

SENATORS, REPRESENTATIVS AND SUNDAY LAWS.

WILL THEY VOTE FOR THE PENDING BILLS?

Some Favor Them, Some Do Not, Many Dislike to Answer, and But Few Tell What They Think—Bowers and Maguire of California Are All Right, and So Are Cummings of New York, Richardson of Michigan, and Hayes of Iowa, but Senator Peffer's Thought Is as Yet Undeveloped.

To each Representativ and Senator of the federal Congress the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER some weeks since sent a letter asking how that member would vote on the Kyle-Johnson and Gallinger-Morse Sunday bills should they be favorably reported from the committees to which they were referred. Here is a copy of the letter:

DEAR SIR: Kindly permit me to call your attention to two bills now in committee rooms of the Senate and House.

The first is entitled "A Bill to Protect the First day of the Week, Commonly Called Sunday, as a Day of Rest and Worship in the District of Columbia." It is Senate Bill No. 1628, and House Bill No. 6215, and was offered in the Senate by Senator Gallinger and in the House by Hon. Mr. Morse. In the Senate it was sent to the Committee on Education and Labor, and in the House to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The title of the second is "A Bill for Sunday Rest." This is Senate Bill No. 1890, and House Bill No. 6592, and was introduced in the Senate by Senator Kyle and in the House by Hon. Mr. Johnson. In the Senate it was sent to the Committee on Education and Labor, and in the House to the Committee on Education.

1. Should one or both of these bills be reported favorably, would you vote therefor?
2. If for one but not for the other, which?
3. If "yes" for either or both, for what reasons?
4. If "no" against either or both, for what reasons?

As it is possible that the bills named may not be conveniently at hand when you receive this, I take the liberty to hand you copies herewith.

Believing that the Gallinger-Morse and Kyle-Johnson bills involve principles in which the American people are vitally interested, I sincerely trust that you will not deem the foregoing questions trifling or discourteous, and that they will receive your candid consideration.

Respectfully soliciting an early reply, I remain,
Yours very truly, E. M. MACDONALD,
Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

WHAT THE REPRESENTATIVS HAV TO SAY.

UNEQUIVOCALLY YES.

ASBURY C. LATIMER, Third District of South Carolina. Democrat. Farmer.

DEAR SIR: Your communication of May 28th to hand and contents carefully noted.

Your first question, Should one or both of these bills be reported favorably, would you vote therefor? In reply to this question, will say that I am decidedly in favor of any law that will look to the proper observance of the Sabbath day, and am heartily in favor of the bill for Sunday rest. In other words, I think the perpetuity of this government depends upon the proper observance of the Sabbath day.

Yours truly, A. C. LATIMER.

YES, WITH CERTAIN INDIRECTIONS.

FERNANDO C. LAYTON, Fourth District of Ohio. Democrat. Lawyer.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 28th inst. relativ to Senate Bill No. 1628 and House Bill No. 6215 to hand, and contents duly noted. I would favor both bills in part with material amendments, which, at present, I hav not time to indicate. I will giv the matter careful investigation and at my earliest opportunity inform you of my conclusion.

Yours respectfully, F. C. LAYTON.

MICHAEL D. HARTER, Fourteenth District of Ohio. Democrat. Manufacturer and Banker.

DEAR SIR: I am in favor of a law which will insure one day of rest out of every seven. Such laws should be passed by the states if they are to be operativ in territory controled by the states.

Personally I am a Lutheran and keep what is known as the Sabbath, but hav no wish to compel others by law to share the views I enjoy on this subject.

The day of rest which I would establish by law would be a civil, not a religious, day of rest.

Yours truly, MICHAEL D. HARTER.

LEVI T. GRIFFIN, First District of Michigan, Democrat.

DEAR SIR: I hav yours of the 28th inst., with copy of two proposed bills which it is anticipated will be introduced into the House of Representativs. It is very difficult to say in advance what action one may be induced to take when the question becomes a practical one. New light is often thrown upon the subject by discussion. I can only say to you generally that I am in favor of a reasonably strict observance of the "first day of the week known as the Lord's Day" and shall do anything that may seem necessary and desirable to help the people of the District of Columbia to quiet and "Sunday rest" on that day. Very truly yours,

LEVI T. GRIFFIN.

ON BOTH SIDES.

JOSEPH WHEELER, Eighth District of Alabama. Democrat. Planter.

MY DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of inquiry I will say that I hav not as yet given careful scrutiny to the bills in question. On general principles I would support a bill tending to foster and encourage religion; at the same time I think laws which fetter individual liberty and bring religion into the domain of legislation are of doubtful utility and should be most carefully considered.

With very high regard, Truly yours,
JOS. WHEELER.

NO, APPARENTLY.

BENJAMIN F. GRADY, Third District of North Carolina. Democrat. Farmer.

If there were a deadly upas-tree in your yard you would hardly make war upon it by simply plucking its leaves one at a time; you would dig it up by its roots. But we hav had growing up in this country for thirty years a deadly tree which I call imperialism and paternalism, the growth of which has been witnessed by a generation of our people, many of whom hav recently come to realize its mischievous properties, and are now begging that a few of its leaves be torn off. So long, however, as the tree stands, the rights and liberties of the states and of their citizens will be in perpetual peril. Many persons who hav witnessed in silence, or even with approval, the growth of this tree are alarmed at the threatened Anti-option bill, Sunday observance bills, and similar logical outgrowths of this hateful tree.

B. F. GRADY.

NO, WITHOUT DOUBT.

AMOS J. CUMMINGS, Eleventh District of New York. Democrat. Journalist.

1. No.
4. Common sense. A. J. CUMMINGS.

GEORGE F. RICHARDSON, Fifth District of Michigan. Democrat. Public Official.

1. No.
4. I do not believe in tolerating religious interference. GEO. F. RICHARDSON.

WALTER I. HAYES. Second District of Iowa. Democrat. Lawyer.

1. No.
2. Neither.
4. We hav enough, and too many, laws at present. WALTER I. HAYES.

WILLIAM W. BOWERS, Seventh District of California. Republican. Hotel Proprietor.

DEAR SIR: I shall oppose all such bills to establish religion—a state religion. The titles of these bills are frauds intended to deceive. The "Sunday rest" pretense is a lie. If these men could hav their way the old days of religious persecutions would come again, with all their damnable cruelties and murders and burnings. It's bad enough now in Maryland and Tennessee and Arkansas, where people are imprisoned and robbed because they are Christians. Yours truly, W. W. BOWERS.

JAMES G. MAGUIRE. Fourth District of California. Democrat. Single-Taxer. Lawyer.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of May 28th, with inclosure, is at hand.

Replying to your first question permit me to state that I will not vote for either of the bills mentioned.

The reason for my determination to vote against either or both of said bills is that I believe in the absolute and perpetual separation of church and state; and that I regard the bills in question as measures tending to the establishment of religion by this government. Very truly yours,

JAMES G. MAGUIRE.

THE SENATORS.

NONCOMMITTAL TO A DEGREE.

WILLIAM A. PEFFER, Kansas. Populist. Journalist.

DEAR SIR: I hav your favor of the 20th inst., in relation to a bill proposing to "protect the first day of the week." If such a bill is brought before the Senate for action, I will be certain to do as you request me to, namely, giv the subject careful consideration. Respectfully, W. A. PEFFER.

JAMES MCMILLAN, Michigan. Republican. Car Builder.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your letter of May 26th, in which you ask certain questions in regard to the Gallinger bill "To Protect the First Day of the Week, Commonly Called Sunday, as a Day of Rest and Worship in the District of Columbia," I would say that the bill is now in the hands of a sub-committee of the Senate District Committee, of which I am a member. Thus far no action has been taken upon it by the sub-committee.

Any views which you may care to present on the subject will receive careful consideration.

Yours truly, JAMES MCMILLAN.

What Is Christianity?

For many years now thoughtful men hav watched that mighty structure of superstition, delusion, and fraud, called "the church of Christ," slowly going to ruin; and the fact that of late the process of decay is somewhat more rapid excites no surprise in them. It is the fruition of a long-deferred hope, the slow ripening of a seed unwittingly planted by "the church" in the plenitude of her power, when she commanded where she now entreats.

The wonder is, not that the whirligig of time should bring the revenge we now see; it is rather that the hoary criminal should hav eluded justice so long. For long and weary years we hav watched the mills of the gods slowly grinding at this grist—watched and waited. It is now three hundred and forty years since John Calvin illustrated Christian love on the body of Servetus. The wonder is that men hav permitted themselvs to be mocked so long.

It is amusing to watch the ground and lofty tumbling now going on among those of the faithful, and those outside who dance to the music set by "the church," who are just beginning to spell out what was blazoned in the heavens when the first unbeliever dared the fire—nay, what was written between the lines when the text, "He that believeth not shall be damned," first became part of the creed of Christendom.

When "the church" first imbrued her hands in the blood of an unbeliever she decreed her own destruction; she made it the duty of all men to wage relentless war upon her. But persecution became a necessity when the dogma was adopted that unbelief is a deadly sin. To teach that unbelievers would be damned in hell was to take upon herself the duty of slaughtering them upon earth. The wonder is not that she is now staggering under that intolerable burden, but that she has carried it so long.

But while we laugh at these tardy seers, we welcome them. They count as kindred souls. As soon as they first consciously perceive the glimmering of the dawn they become our friends and the enemies of "the church," even though they continue for some time to affirm that it is still dark, and that the night is eternal.

The favorit delusion just now among those loath to accept the implications of what they see is that there is a something called Christianity ("Christ's Christianity," some of them call it), which is separate and distinct from "the church," and not necessarily involved in the ruin of the latter.

"Three Critics" is the heading of a recent article in the Springfield Republican. The three critics are Archbishop Ireland, Roman Catholic; Dr. E. H. Hall, Unitarian, and Dr. Briggs, "liberal Presbyterian" (how queer that sounds). They substantially agree that there is a "growing divergence between the best intelligence of the time and the church;" that "the new knowledge of the time compels men to ask troublesome questions, and because the Christian church has only hesitating and unsatisfactory answers to them, they are driven back into skepticism and indifference;" that "the church must answer or lose its thoughtful disciples;" that "people no longer trust its utterances on theology because all that it has to say, officially and formally, is medieval and outworn;" that "the men who are trained in the thought of the age cannot think the thoughts of the church and will not;" that "the church of the day does not hold up a high ethical standard of conduct as an essential part of its scheme of salvation;" and that reunion between modern civilization and the church "is to be accomplished not by the time-spirit adapting itself to the church, but by the church accepting in large measure the guidance of the time-spirit, modifying its theology to the demands of the thoughtful, free-minded men and women of our day, and giving up all its positions inconsistent with science, scholarship, and logic. It is the church that must yield."

"Undoubtedly this is true," adds the wiseacre of the Republican, "and yet there is nothing in this truth which at all menaces the permanency of Christianity or the hold of the simple gospel of Jesus on human hearts. The church is not Christianity or any essential part of it, nor is theology or tradition. These are all instruments or channels through which the Christian life has flowed into the world, and as such must be changed to meet changing conditions and new demands. So long as Christianity remains the highest form of religious truth the world knows, whether it hav supernatural sanction or not, it has nothing to fear from any change in the machinery of its expression which new conditions and new knowledge may demand."

It is difficult to understand such language as this. If it is prompted simply by a desire to salve the hurt caused by the penetration of these new ideas into the minds of the Republican's readers and save the paper from loss, it is intelligible indeed. We are perfectly familiar with the fact that what the press says about Christianity is to be understood simply as what editors think the public like to read. But one likes to believe that when men undertake to discuss questions of the most solemn import to mankind, questions about life and death and doom, about "the peopled earth, the unpeopled heaven, the o'erpeopled hell," what they hav to say springs from clear thought and profound conviction. And when they mock us with empty words we cannot quite repress our indignation, even though long use and custom hav familiarized us with this pious mockery.

What is Christianity? The question relates, of course, to the meaning of the word "Christianity." If there were a definit, tangible, visible thing by universal consent called by that name the answer would be simple. It would be necessary only to point to the thing. If all or nearly all the Christian world used the word in a clear and definit sense, and no large number calling themselvs Christians ever attached a contradictory meaning to it, it would be easy to define it. But since the state of Christendom has long been such that whatever definition is given the word by a large body of Christians is at once contradicted by other large bodies of Christians, it long ago ceased to be fit to be used at all by the defenders of Christianity. Nothing conduces so much to clearness of thought as to refuse to use a word not only till one is sure he knows what he means by it, but also can make his readers understand what he means by it.

This case, let me remark, presents no difficulties to the opponents of the creeds of Christendom. When they say Christianity is not true they mean that nothing ever known to the world by that name is true, and the language carries its meaning on its face. But our Christian friends would do well to drop the word from their vocabulary until its meaning is settled.

What is Christianity? I propose to prove by solid argument that there is no such thing—an argument that is as iron to tow in comparison with anything I hav ever found in the Christian evidences.

The triune "church of Christ" is divided into three great bodies—Greeks, Protestants, and Roman Catholics—the three being one, "the bride of the Lamb," for they all speak of "the church" in the singular number; and the language of the founder clearly implies unity and indivisibility. Moreover, no Christian will admit that "the Lamb" has three brides. But millions of Christians can be brought to testify that each of these great divisions is the "bride of the Lamb" to the exclusion of the two others.

I am treading on delicate ground here, dear reader, but you will kindly bear in mind that the difficulty is not of my creating. Since, now, we hav the best of evidence—the testimony, namely, of two-thirds, roughly speaking, of the Christian world—that neither of these divisions is the true "bride of the Lamb," it follows that the Lamb has no bride and that Christianity is not.

But if we leave the three one brides (or bride) to settle the dispute among herself (or themselvs) and "go to the Bible" (Christ's Christianity) to find out what Christianity is, we shall return as empty-handed. In this field of argumentation we shall knock Christianity on the head with a text—nay, with several texts, in the manner of theologians. Is there any proposition, clearly proven by a text, that cannot also be clearly refûted by a text?

The founder of Christianity distinctly asserts that no rich man can be a Christian; and since no man in these days is voluntarily poor, it follows that there are no Christians and is no Christianity. He commands his disciples to submit without resistance to every form of outrage and wrong; and since no man heeds that command there are no Christians. In Mark xvi he givs certain signs by which believers (that is, Christians) may be known. They shall cast out devils, they shall handle venomous reptils and swallow poison without harm, and perform other miracles. And since these signs are nowhere visible it follows that there are no Christians. Again, he says that a Christian must hate his father and his mother, and wife and children, and brethren and sisters, and his own life. Now, it is notorious that Christian hate (and there is surely enough of it) is not carried quite to that pitch of absurdity; hence there is no Christianity.

What is Christianity? The trouble with those who rush into the lists to do battle for this "lost cause" is that they will not sit down before the word and patiently stay there until it yields up its meaning, if it has any; but they at once begin to dance around it, and perform genuflexions, and toss it in the air, and juggle with it; and they fool with their tricks not only their audience but themselvs also.

What is Christianity? Again I say, it behooves every Christian apologist to drop the word from his vocabulary until general usage shall hav settled its meaning. It is plain that no Christian can tell us what Christianity is; for whatever definition he may giv, along comes another Christian (all Christians are equally entitled to credence) and flatly contradicts him. Moreover, an unconquerable prejudice, incapacitating them for seeing the truth, is the heritage of woe to which the children of faith are born. No man knows what Christianity is until he holds it at a distance and views it in perspectiv.

Day before yesterday men bold enough to proclaim their disbelief in Christian dogmas were summarily dealt with. The rack, the dungeon, the stake—through fire to fire they went, and no man dared lift his voice in their behalf. Yesterday the teeth of the man-hunting Christian tigress had been drawn and her claws pared, and she had to be content without much blood. A few years in prison, with cold, hunger, rags, and filth—all this could be endured rather than the agony of the fire through which Servetus and Bruno went to undying fame, and set their souls as pilot stars in the heavens to show men the way to duty. To-day those who hav wealth, or wit, or genius, or the title "Rev." or "D.D.," can say what they please against those dogmas without much inconvenience. Those not so fortunate must be more careful. In many parts of the Christian world they must be very careful and reticent or suffer serious annoyance and loss. The poisoned arrows of vituperation still fly and wound. The "simple gospel of Jesus" is still potent enough to trample honest poor men under foot and heap good things upon those willing to pretend to believe what they know they do not believe. "The church militant" reaches a dead hand through time and touches men into silence. "Heredity, the molding force of circumstances, the iron hold of the past upon the present"—these, and not real belief, are what sustain the tottering throne. But the silence is becoming intolerable. The muttering thunders are beginning to be heard. Men cannot much longer stifle the voice of duty.

To-morrow many will be saying boldly what a few are now saying timidly, that among the evils remediable by man, that hav devastated the world, Christianity stands pre-eminent,

> By merit raised to that bad eminence; an evil to be warred upon by all good men until it shall be finally destroyed out of the world. The next day "the church" will hav become a hated memory.

> Lo, the foul phantoms, silent in the gloom
> Of the flown ages, part to yield thee room,

And with one voice men will hasten to say they never believed her horrible dogmas, never supported or defended her, always opposed and denounced her.

Liberty, freedom to think and speak one's honest thought, now the high privilege of a few, will then hav become the heritage of the many.

I count it immortal honor to be part of a

> Voice in the rich dawn of an ampler day, proclaiming news of good to men.

Freethought Progress.

Mrs. Hedwig Henrich-Wilhelmi lectured in Vienna from March 1st to 20th to ever-increasing audiences.

An oaths amendment bill has passed the Barbadoes House of Assembly. It reproduces the bill passed in England permitting affirmation instead of swearing.

The Canada Revue of May 10th was mailed to each member of the priest caste in the diocese of Montreal and their special attention called to the leading article, "Pages d'Histoire," a very able editorial by Duroc, which closes with the only too true saying, "Clericalisme! See, there is the enemy!"

The Legitimation League of England, founded in 1893, aims to create machinery to secure for children born out of wedlock legal recognition and equality of rights with other children. It wishes to destroy one of the unfortunate practical effects of the doctrin of vicarious atonement, the suffering of the innocent for the offenses of others. The illegitimate children of princes and kings are treated differently at the expense of the people.

The leading article of De Dageraad is "Oorsprong der Godsdiensten" ("Origin of Religious Worship"), by the prominent Dutch Freethinker, J. G. Ten Bokkel. ∴ Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" gets a good send-off in De Dageraad, which expresses the hope that in it Holland will not be forgotten. We assure our contemporary that Holland is not forgotten. Every Dutch Freethinker of prominence, so far as known to us, is mentioned, and as with Holland, so with all other countries. Putnam's work is an international work on Freethought.

Italy, though behind us in some respects, is away ahead of us in others. A clerical member of the municipal council of Modena complained that a Jewess had been installed as teacher in a public school. The official school journal, Rinnovamento Scolastico, says editorially in response: "It is time to emphasize the fact that the national school is not a parochial school." In Italy only children whose parents desire religious instruction for them receive it, and this only every Thursday, when they are allowed to leave the school to procure it. Thursday is to the children of Italy what Saturday is to ours.

The eighty-fourth anniversary of Thomas Paine's death was observed at Park Ridge, five miles southwest of Frederic, Md., on June 8th. The flag of the United States was draped in black and a farm bell tolled to call the neighbors to hear a discourse on Paine and his services. This was near the home of Aaron Davis. ∴ An incorporated Freethought association, to be known as the Washington Liberal League, has been formed in the national capital. Charles Carter is president. ∴ The yearly meeting of the Society of Friends, recently adjourned, made two important changes in the disciplin: Members may marry outside the society and the women's meeting is given equal voice with the men's.

Several Spanish Freethought societies celebrated the seventieth anniversary of the birth of Dr. Ludwig Büchner, author of "Force and Matter." Especially successful was the celebration of the Society Los Amigos del Progreso, of which the well-known Freethought orator, D. Lucio Catalina, is president. ∴ The public subscription for a monument in honor of Ramon Chiés has now reached the sum of 3,440.25 pesetas. ∴ Sr. José Llunas, editor of La Tramontana, Barcelona, who was sentenced to three years' imprisonment, as we informed our readers in an editorial in our issue of May 26th, has been liberated. His liberation is due to the efforts of D. N. Salmeron, the eminent Spanish jurist, statesman, and Freethinker. We congratulate Sr. Llunas on his escape from the clerical clutches. ∴ A great mass-meeting, under the auspices of the Freethinkers of Barcelona, took place last month. D. Nicolas Salmeron and Odon Buen presided. Resolutions denouncing clerical interference in secular matters were unanimously adopted. ∴ The agitation for the total separation of church and state is rapidly spreading in Spain. The last journal to take up the battle is the conservativ Revista Contemporánea.

Dr. Ludwig Büchner has donated ten thousand copies of the popular edition of "Force and Matter" to the German Freethought Federation. Each copy sells for two marks in paper covers and 2.50 marks in cloth. Professor Büchner is a Freethinker not alone in word but in deed. ∴ The reading circle, "Ulm-Neu-Ulm," has entered the German Freethought Federation. ∴ The German Freethought Federation held its annual congress on May 12–15 at Köln a. Rhine. Speeches were delivered by Professor Büchner on "Anti-Christian Christianity;" by Dr. Ed. Haufe, on "National Education and National Spirit;" by Dr. Bruno Wille, on "The Ennobling of Mankind;" and by Dr. A. Volkel, "The New Scientific Foundation of Morality." ∴ On the occasion of his seventieth anniversary, Prof Ludwig Büchner was the recipient of an engraved address signed by all officers of the National Federation and by those of the branch societies. In the upper left-hand corner of the address is a female figure in haut-relief standing on scarlet and representing the Muse of Science. Back of the globes she rests her right hand on a stack of books, while her left holds out triumphantly a scroll on which is written "Liberty, Education, and Welfare for All." At her feet lie a chain, a sword, a law tablet—all broken. In the lower right hand corner a spirit illuminates a sketch representing a cloister-door and prison, the dark inmates of which hide themselvs from the light. ∴ The Free Religious society of Berlin, Germany, held its yearly election of officers. Mr. Otto Friederici-Friedenau was elected for the ninth time as president. The society numbers 2,775 male members, who, with their familes, swell the number to 8,000. During 1893, 348 persons became members, and 122 members died. The society has 520 children of school age. The income was 13,820 marks, 26 pf. The expenses, including fines and cost of lawsuits with the government, 13,360 9 pf. The private property of the society amounts to 40,888 marks 77 pf.

In the city of d'Hyéres, France, a Freethinker was recently buried. According to his wishes the funeral was to be secular. The church thought it would be a great thing to claim as convert a French Freemason and Freethinker and made several attempts even at the grave. The conduct caused great indignation, which increased when the priests carried off a wreath of immortelles placed upon the coffin by the Freemasons of Toulon. Out of respect to the family no fight took place, but on the dav following a protest signed by two thousand citizens denounced the church and the clerical body-snatchers. ∴∴ The French Freethought Federation held a very succesful congress at Paris on March 25, 1894. After paying all expenses during the past year there remained of the various funds 3,115.35 francs in the hands of the treasurer. Since Jan. 1, 1894, eight societies and forty individuals hav joined the Federation, while since 1890 the increase has been 237 societies and 360 individuals. During the past as well as present year the municipality of Paris has donated 600 francs to the Federation as a testimonial of appreciation of its work. The Federation indorsed the work of Comité d'Etudes Morales, while it resolved to sever its official connection with the Socialistic party, owing to the ultra-violent measures of the latter in propagating its doctrins. Of the twenty-five members elected to the Central Council Adam received 77 votes, Pasquier 66, and Jardin 65. Of the members of the Commission of Control Bévalet received 54 votes, Degardin 52, and Dutertre 45. ∴∴ Comité d'Etudes Morales, at its meeting on March 3d, reorganized its bureau: President, Jean Paul Ceé; vice-presidents, G. Martin and E. Pasquier; secretaries, De Méritens, Gaston Cherut, and Louis Grandvilliers. All communications are to be addressed to De Méritens, 3 Rue de Cloître St. Merri, Paris. ∴∴ M. Victor Schalcher, member of the French Senate, and a prominent Freethinker, who died last winter, in his testament donated 10,000 francs to the Society Orphelinat de Seine, a Freethinkers' orphan asylum in Paris. ∴∴ We are the recipients of a copy of "Une Mère Vierge." This excellent translation of G. W. Foote's "A Virgin Mother," was made by Mr. C. Cilwa, editor of La Vérité, and deserves a large circulation among our French brethren. ∴∴ The French Freethinkers' Annual for 1894 is out. We hav not yet received a copy, hence must confine our notice to the fact that the price is 1.50 francs. ∴∴ The French society Libre Pensee Democratique Montargoise, has, since its organization in 1882, taken charge of 129 burials, 7 marriages, 4 baptisms; it has held 9 conferences, 199 monthly reunions and general assemblages. Its treasurer holds funds amounting to 2,147.52 francs. The society has its own funeral paraphernalia for children as well as adults. The president of this society is Mr. Chevalier; secretary, Mr. A. Douine. ∴∴ Le Phare, a Parisian journal devoted to literature and art, contains in a late number an excellent portrait and biography of our indefatigable friend, the Anglo-French Freethinker, C. Cilwa. ∴∴ The world moves; even the Catholic church does. The latest comes to us from Auxerre, where, according to La Vérité, the children of a Catholic church produced on February 6th, under the direction of a priest, "Bourgeois Gentilhomme," by the excommunicated Molière.

Observations.

A Baptist church in New Brunswick, N. J., has introduced an innovation in the communion service. It has been customary there, as in other churches on communion Sunday, for the deacons to pass the wine in a chalice, from which all partook; but now each communicant is supplied with an individual cup. When they are "all set," at a signal from the minister everybody drinks. The reporters state that the ordinance so observed is more impressiv than the old style. I don't know about that, but I should think it would seem a good deal more familiar.

The job which I hold as what Mr. John Peck might call a "handy man" in THE TRUTH SEEKER office places me in a position to say that on page 426 of the current volume (this issue) there is printed a letter from Mr. Chas. O. Hays, of Locust Corner, Ohio. Mr. Hays may take my word for it that the only "editorial" function I perform is to look over the proofs of his and other contributors' letters and see that the printers hav done them no injustice. The best of them sometimes fall down on spelling, punctuation, and grammar, and the Editor and myself hav to help them up again. Printing and proof-reading is my profession; I also revise manuscripts, which work is made necessary by the fact that although many brains may generate valuable thoughts they cannot always think of the best form for expressing them, any more than the miner can coin his product or do fillagree business. This is the extent of my editorial work. On Sundays, instead of attending church, I commit my weekly offense.

Mr. Hays objects to my statement that there is free trade in labor, whence I conclude that somebody has deluded him into the belief that there is a tariff on immigrants. So far as I know, however, the European laborer has only his fare to pay in order to land on American soil and enter into free competition with the nativ of this soil. Manufactured and other goods, on the contrary, must not only pay the cost of their transportation, but also a certain ad valorem or specific duty; and this is what led me to observe that while the manufacturer and producer may claim that they are protected, there is "free trade in labor." If Mr. Hays of the metropolis of Locust Corner, Ohio, is inclined to speak seriously, I would like to hav him divulge two things—namely: 1. What he thought I meant by the above remark; and, 2. What he means when he says that there is not free trade in labor.

Mr. Hays refers in closing to the uselessness of dosing
A man in death reposing, having donned his burial gown;
But the difference immense is, when the patient has his senses,
And the dose such an offense is, that It Won't Go Down.

Senator Peffer is not at present prepared to say whether he thinks national Sunday laws are a good thing or not. It is one of the drawbacks of our common humanity that the brain sometimes develops much more slowly than the whiskers.

I will now giv the closing stanzas of Prof. J. H. Cook's poetical tribute to S. P. Putnam. Mr. Cook says of his subject:

7. He has a body to sustain
That thinking and prolific brain;
Can talk and write; recuperate,
Happy and joyous in every state.

Those are true words. Putnam, like D. M. Bennett, is a good rester, and snatches a nap at short notice as another man might grab a sandwich. I never saw him weary. Even bad luck does not make him tired. Where some might be affected that way he gets mad and swears, which seems to refresh him, as it does all within the sound of his voice. The other verses are:

8. Where'er for liberty he pleads,
I glory in his humane deeds.
How many vict'ries he has won!
Prodigious labor he has done.

9. Prodigious labor on Freethought—
May it be ever read and sought;
Oh, for a thousand in the field,
Their tongues and pens for right to wield.

10. My hard career is nearly run,
My life's sore battle nearly done;
But long liv Putnam; may his name,
Through works achieved, win deathless fame.

Such are my sentiments also, and I think that Professor Cook will long exist to sing of mighty deeds. I hear that owing to hard lines the professor has for some time maintained himself on an income of about fifty cents a week, and when a man can liv so economically as that a funeral would be a wholly unnecessary piece of extravagance.

Anyone who entered the hall of the Manhattan Liberal Club last Friday evening before the services began could hav seen that something unusual was on hand. The tariff was ten cents instead of five; women and Presbyterians were subject to duty; all the electric lights were turned on, and President Foote wore the low-cut vest and spiketail coat incident to full dress. The hall was crowded when the doctor called the assemblage to order, read the customary announcements, like a pastor from his pulpit, and gave notice that at the close of the exercises the club would adjourn until the first Friday in October, unless a special meeting should be held in September to celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of its existence. The program called for five-minute speeches from members on the one thing they would like to hav the Constitutional convention do, interspersed with music and recitations. Henry Nichols went first to the bat, and it looked like a long inning, but within the appointed time he wafted the sphere to deep center by proposing that the convention recommend the adoption of the French land law, limiting holdings of the earth's surface. Twenty years ago, he said, the members of the Liberal Club could move in the upper circles of society, but to-day, without deteriorating, they must take their place in a distinct middle class.

Moses Oppenheimer ensued. Mr. Oppenheimer is growing middle-aged in the service, and the gray hairs that decorate his pompadour suggest a brindle steer with a white star in the forehead. It was difficult for him to pick the supreme issue out of his many hobbies, he said, but the initiativ and referendum, making the government democratic instead of representativ, would be his first choice. A solo by Miss Beckwith relieved the mental strain, and then Mr. Wilson took the platform. His proposition was that no act should be deemed a crime that did not work an injury to some other individual. Under present statutes and regulations, he said, the most orderly and urbane person could not spend twenty-four hours in New York without of necessity committing some offense for which he could be apprehended by the police.

Mr. Baldwin gave a humorous discourse on "Birds," including the park policeman, the bicyclus fiendus, the felis domesticus, and other songsters. Mr. E. C. Walker, by invitation, took the platform, getting there with both feet well in hand, as might be said. He evinced a lack of confidence in the wisdom and good intentions of the Convention, and maintained that the most patriotic thing it could do was to adjourn. He could not understand how a people whose sorest affliction came from a multiplicity of laws could hope for relief from an increase of the burden. A lady member of the Club having given an excellent recitation, Henry Rowley, of Brooklyn, was lifted to the front on the wave of applause that followed the mention of his name. Mr. Rowley had been studying the state constitution and found little worth retaining except the preamble. He suggested, as a useful measure, that cities be forbidden to giv away valuable franchises or to sell them for less than they were worth to the people. President Foote sang a poem which he had composed. The words related to the characteristics of debating members of the Club, referring incidentally to the onerous duties of the president, while the music covered a range of about four notes natural and one sharp. It did not strain the doctor's voice, but it came near breaking the ribs of his audience. Wilson McDonald, the sculptor, was next elicited from his retreat in the corner and induced to testify. Mr. McDonald is worthy to be called the woman's friend, as he recommended first that the word "male" be expunged from the constitution, and secondly that any man who lifted his hand against his wife, save in self-defense, presumably, should be tied to a post and given thirty-nine lashes. He would also abolish the saloon. Otherwise he would suggest that the growlers giv America a rest. We were importing a very undesirable class of foreigners, who were especially vociferous against our institutions and he hoped they would subside. As Sculptor McDonald's allusion to foreigners was a sort of plaster cast of Mr. Oppenheimer, many eyes were turned toward that gentleman, who smiled and looked happy.

The next number of the program was a most extraordinary affair, being nothing less than a dance performed by a young lady in an accordion skirt. It was quite up-to-date, and revealed, among other interesting things, the fact that in some instances the joints of the human system may perform the function of swivels. Deep silence reigned in the audience during the exercise, and at its close there was hearty applause in the front row. Mr. Reed recalled attention to the subject under discussion by reading a short paper on the abolition of the Senate as a question worthy the consideration of the Convention. Another lady member recited acceptably, and ex-Senator Boyd was called for, President Foote observing that although Mr. Boyd had been a legislator he might "hav some ideas." Mr. Boyd's ideas proved to be the same as those of Wilson McDonald as regards the whipping-post. Other events were Mrs. Winterburn's solo; Professor Ames on an educational test for voters; Mr. Abelson in a song; Captain Sweetland of the Coxey army, who paid his respects to the New York police, and Mr. Johnson on righteousness. Dr. Foote, whose previous song had not fatigued him, then presented himself with a still better one. It was entitled "Parkhurst's solo," which Dr. Foote, in a costume that made him look very much like that reverend reformer, sang to the tune of "The Bowery." The song has eight stanzas of eight lines each, with a chorus. It set forth how Dr. Parkhurst, having without a flutter seen everything unclothed in the city, finally struck the Liberal Club and was so shocked at beholding the naked truth that he resolved he would "never go there any more." Everybody laughed so violently that, the night being warm, great streams of perspiration set the floor awash and flushed the lee scuppers, as I am told.

Mr. T. B. Wakeman gave the peroration and benediction. The duty of the Constitutional Convention, as he viewed it, was to substitute a popular for a priestly government and to tax church property. He also bade the audience auf wieder sehen, which, translated into German, means, So long.

GEO. E. MACDONALD.

News and Notes.

The Liberals of Adamsville, Mich., and vicinity organized grove meetings for June 23d and 24th, and there was quite a gathering. It was something new in this country, and the preachers hardly knew what to make of it. They kept religiously away, however, and did their level best to make others do the same. They scented danger in the air.

The place of meeting was a beautiful grove on the farm of Mr. Stevens, who has been for many years a prominent worker in the church, but is of independent mind, and is not afraid to show a neighborly feeling even to those who differ from himself. The orthodox gave him a severe raking over for being so generous to the heretic, but he pursued the even tenor of his way and was determined that truth should hav a fair field. The elements were somewhat mixed for the success of the lectures. It was awfully hot on Saturday morning, but by afternoon quite a breeze was sweeping through the forest arcade, and the distant horizon was flashing with showers, and it was quite comfortable. Sunday dawned splendidly and the air was refreshing, and over three hundred were present at the meeting. It looked favorable for the afternoon gathering until about one o'clock, when a big squall blew along, and the rain descended, and for an hour or two it seemed as if we should hav to adjourn altogether. But finally the blue skies prevailed, and the lecture was given to an audience nearly as large as that of the morning. Undoubtedly if the day had been clear throughout, six hundred people would hav been present at the closing session. As it was, quite a success has been achieved for a first effort. I left New York on Friday morning, and arrived at Elkhart, Ind., early Saturday, June 23d, where I was met by Mr. A. S. Bowman. There are some Liberals at Elkhart, among them Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Weyrich, who gave us a cordial welcome at their hospitable table for the morning meal, after which we drove to Adamsville through one of the best farming sections in America, where the grass and the wheat are in prime condition while the corn is unusually backward, but is evidently making up lost time. You can almost see it grow in the heated atmosphere. Adamsville is a country place altogether. There is no hall for public meetings, and so the lectures had to be given in a grove. I hope to see a Freethought hall here some day. The Liberals are well-to-do, and are really a majority if all would show their hand. I found generous entertainment with Mr. A. S. Bowman and family, Wm. Conley and Mr. Moser, who were the main movers in this affair and bore the brunt of the expenses. Without their unflinching courage this Freethought campaign would not hav been so successfully carried through. Among others of Adamsville and vicinity who lent a hand are James M. Truitt, who presided at the Sunday morning meeting, Capt. H. R. Schutt, L. C. Bishop, H. B. Mead, M. Olds, H. W. Brown, L. E. Wooden, S. J. Graham, J. H. Strong, Charles Lyon, C. Cooper, John Crouse, MacMann and others. Niles, Redfield, Edwardsburg, Union, and Cassopolis were represented with Adamsville.

I also met Harvey Conley, who is a nativ of Adamsville, but is quite a worker for Freethought in Kansas, Nebraska, Indiana, and other states. He was visiting home and remained over to aid the meetings.

I was quite encouraged with the outlook here and delighted with the friends I met. Organization is needed. With persistent and united effort I am sure that this will be one of the best fields for Freethought.

The Arion Quartette Club of Elkhart furnished excellent music for the occasion, and its members are evidently Liberal minded as well as melodious singers. On the whole, Adamsville has made a fine opening for the year's campaign. After visiting Nevinsville, Ia., I shall then try the northernmost part of Michigan, a new country, Red Jacket, Sidnaw, and Drummond. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Was-to-Hav-Been Debate.

The following note from Franklin Steiner completes the story of the Christian retreat at Pierson:

DES MOINES, IA., June 27, E. M. 294.

I thought I would tell you the final outcome of the proposed debate in Pierson. Jamieson did not get the letters and telegrams, telling him not to come, in time, so he came ahead expecting to debate. Our people formed a committee, who went with Jamieson to call on the preachers, to whom Jamieson talked like a father, telling them that for the sake of honesty, if nothing more, they should fulfil their contract. They said they would do all they could to bring the debate about. Jamieson opened up a course of six lectures, all of which were a challenge to "stand up for Jesus" It had no effect, for they would not make arrangements, and Jamieson is now on his way to Colorado. My opinion is that the preachers were willing to discuss, but that Dungan himself is tired of debate. Country town preachers and Christians think that an Infidel can be cut into mincemeat by a Christian debater, but the "debaters" themselvs are not so positiv. It was a back-down pure and simple.

Providence.

"The Lord is good to all and his tender mercies are over all his works."

Atheists are very frequently charged with being dogmatic because they assert that there is no evidence of a God in the universe. It seems to me that the dogmatism is wholly on the side of those who postulate a God and invest him with certain attributes without a particle of evidence to show that such a being exists.

This belief in God and his providence has worked and is working untold evil in the world. Out of it, among other evils, "has sprung the monster Fear." Fear is not an ennobling emotion, and the coward is despised of men. Yet religion has made a race, yea, almost a world of cowards. Behold them prostrate in abject fear before a creation of their own disordered minds! Were it not so terribly tragical, so humiliating to that manhood, that supremacy which man enjoys over the brutes by virtue of his reason, this spectacle would be the most stupendous "comedy of errors" ever performed on the world's stage. But this is only one of the evils that spring from this belief. Its votaries are slaves, not only to an infinit monster in the skies, but also to his "vicars" on earth, the priest and king. No human power could adequately estimate or describe the baneful influence these "God-anointed" hav exercised over the destinies of men. Tyrants and slaves! Almost the whole history of the race since this belief was first conceived in the brain of ignorance, has been the history of tyrants and slaves; God anointed, God appointed tyrants, and God-created slaves! "The powers that be are ordained of God" has been the watchword of despots in every age. Fostering, encouraging, and enforcing the belief in their "divine right" for their own selfish ends they hav entailed more miseries on the human race than it has ever suffered from all the pitiless elements. Wars and massacres, famins and pestilences, are its natural fruits, and ignorance, poverty, and slavery hav ever been the lot of those who fell beneath its sway. The world to-day groans under the burdens religion has imposed upon the children of men.

Degrading and enslaving both body and mind, it has rendered him who was created the "crown of creation," the very "incarnation of the mightiest efforts of nature," in many respects lower than the brutes. This, the most stupendous and infernal crime of the ages, has been accomplished by the oppressors of the race through the instrumentality of this insane belief in the providence of God. The history of those peoples who hav been the most imbued with this belief furnishes abundant evidence of its pernicious character. It was one of the causes of the downfall of the Roman empire, and the sole cause of the night that enshrouded Europe for a thousand years. Its workings may be seen to-day in the ignorance, degradation, and slavery that prevail in those countries most subject to its sway, in Spanish America, Spain, Italy, and Russia, the curse, the menace of the world. No friend of his race can contemplate the damnable crimes against human liberty that are daily committed in the latter country in the name and by means of religion, without feelings of the deepest indignation. Anathema maranatha, forever accursed by religion, the scourge of the world! The Russian peasant is so stupid in this belief in the divine right of his rulers, so subject to the power of the priests, so ignorant and superstitious; in short, so thoroughly religious, that there is little hope for his emancipation, unless the civilized powers of the earth (if there be any such) unite in the name of outraged humanity and sweep the power that enslaves him "from the map of the world."

That this belief is not confined to the countries above specified—that it flourishes here, under the banner of liberty, in the land of Jefferson and Jackson, is patent to everyone who is abreast of the times. D. S. Littell, a member of the National Reform Association, in an article explanatory of the doctrins and objects of that association, says "that Almighty God is the source of all power and authority in civil government. Government is a divine ordinance. Its powers and prerogativs proclaim it such. It wields divine powers. It exercises divine prerogativ. Civil government is an absolute sovereign in the sphere of man's relations." And much more to the same effect. (See New York TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 9, 1893). And he proves the truth of these assertions by the scriptures! And they are indorsed not only by the members of his own large association, but also by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and the Society of Christian Endeavor, altogether more than a million of American Christians.

This declaration of doctrins so utterly at variance with the "self-evident truths" upon which this government was founded—the truths for which our forefathers "fought and bled and died"—shows the loyalty of these "children of the king" to American principles. They want not only "God in the Constitution," but also the acknowledgment in supreme law of the land that "Jesus is king of kings and the rightful source of all civil powers." They would reverse the verdict of the great Revolution, render nugatory the splendid achievements for human liberty, which are its flower and fruit, and "turn back the hands on the dial" to that time when the whole of religiondom contained only priests and kings and slaves.

Supernatural religion stands to-day, as in the past, an almost insuperable barrier across the pathway of the race. When man learns that his welfare depends wholly upon his own efforts—that he need expect no aid from supernatural powers—then, and only then, will there be "hope for the world." "Self-reliance," says Radenhausen, "must increase with the knowledge that the world is ruled, not by capricious, unknown spirits, but by known infrangible laws." Man becomes enlightened and civilized in proportion as he becomes free. It is his nature, when free to follow his inclinations, to question, investigate, experiment, and thus work out his own salvation by increasing his knowledge of nature's laws. "When ruled by despotism," says Büchner, "men become hypocritical, submissiv slaves, destitute of a sense of honor and dignity." The effect is the same whether the despotism to which they submit be "the theological despotism of the skies, the theocratic despotism of kings, or the democratic despotism of majorities." Slavery is stagnation; not only for the slave, but for the enslaver. Were it not for the rebels who hav stood forth in every age to denounce the tyrant and defy his power, the human race would be to-day building pyramids or making "bricks without straw" under the lash. To them we owe whatever of freedom we now enjoy, and the hope that a day will yet come when tyranny and fear and ignorance shall no longer curse the land, when scepter and mitre shall moulder unheeded away, and palace and cathedral sink to unremembered dust. For that day we wait. And "while we wait we work."

Lectures and Meetings.

THE Friendship Liberal League, corner of Broad and Wallace, in Warner Music Hall, Philadelphia.

THE Detroit Investigator Society meets every Sunday afternoon at the hall, No. 32 Monroe avenue.

THE First Secular church of Portland, aided by the Oregon Secular Union, gave its second annual excursion July 4, 1894. The route was as follows: Through the Locks at Oregon City to Castle Kehm on the Willamette, the home of the lecturer of the church, and secretary of the O. S. S. U.; past Rock Island, the grand and beautiful scenery of which is not surpassed in the state of Oregon, and thence to New Era, where the future camp ground of the O. S. S. U. is located. On this day Mr. and Mrs. Wittenberg presented to the O. S. S. U. a deed for ten acres of land, henceforth to be known as the Oregon Secular park. Addresses were made by President W. W. Jesse, of the O. S. S. U.; T. R. Kemp, president of the Portland Secular church; Mrs. A. E. Barker, of the Forest Grove Union; N. A. Olds, superintendent of the Portland Secular Sunday School; Katie Kehm Smith, lecturer of the Portland Secular church; and other members of the executiv committee of the O. S. S. U. On this day the Union considered the proposition of Mr. and Mrs. Wittenberg to donate additional land for a Secular college. For a month following the excursion the Secularists of the state will hold a camp meeting on the grounds, and all desiring to attend should come with tents and provisions and camp upon the ground. Freethinkers everywhere should exert an effort to make this, the first camp meeting, a grand success. Come for recreation and pleasure and help carry to the front our glorious banner of Freethought.

George Should Take More Equestrian Exercise.

ATCHISON, KAN., June 20, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I hav read George's Decoration Day poem twenty times. Every line is beautiful. Instead of a trinity of poets—Ingersoll, Putnam, and "Saladin"—we have a quartet. Your brother should mount his Pegasus oftener.

Ever yours, J. E. REMSBURG.

Comes Into the Fold at Last.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., June 4, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is $6.50 for a year's subscription and a "Devil's Battle Ax," for such and like terms will be given to "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" by the enslaved orthodox adherents when friend Putnam's book is at large to sow seeds of "evil" throughout the land.

Four years ago in Victoria, B. C., I had the pleasure of hearing a lecture on Freethought, delivered by Mr. Putnam, under the auspices of the Victoria Secular Union, and later on had a "shake hands" with him at a "desecrating" Secular Sunday picnic. This Union revealed to me the existence of THE TRUTH SEEKER, which I hav bought many times since, until at last her seductiv influence, coupled with your offer of Mr. Putnam's book, has overcome procrastination and I hav become a regular subscriber, in spite of the scarcity of the almighty dollar.

Yours in Freethought,

CLARENCE M. SHAW.

Certainly an Apology is Due from Heston.

NEWPORT, O., June 18, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I hand you $11.50 for two copies of "Four Hundred Years" and renewal of Mr. F. Bly's subscription. I see by your issue of June 16th that old subscribers as well as new may avail themselvs of that offer.

I think Heston's picture, "Trying to Get a Settlement," is all right with one exception—he has the devil credited with the invention of instruments for torturing heretics. I did not know that the devil had ever been charged with that crime. I hav often heard him charged with the invention of all things useful, especially opiates for the relieving of pain—particularly in regard to the relief of pain in childbirth. I hav for many years thought pretty well of the devil; he has been the only real friend mankind has had among all the supernatural beings, and I hate to see his record attacked in this manner, and by a heretic. It is awful; the theologian never ventured so far. Hoping Heston will "recant" those charges, I will bid you Good morning.

E. P. BLY.

Steiner at St. Joseph.

ST. JOSEPH, MO., May 28, 1894.

Our colossus of Freethought (not of Rhodes), of Des Moines, Ia., Mr. Franklin Steiner, delivered two lectures at Turner Hall in our city on Sunday afternoon and evening, May 27th, and we will say for our young friend that he is a walking, living, energetic encyclopedia of biblical and so-called profane history, and will in the near future be quoted as good authority by historians and learned men in all civilized countries. Mr. Steiner's afternoon subject was, "The Evidences of Christianity Tested," and to say that he did ample justice to his subject would be a very mild statement. Christianity was subjected to a most crucial test. It was weighed in the historical balance and found wofully wanting, and the lecture was listened to with marked attention by the very intelligent and interested audience.

Mr. Steiner's subject at night was "The Great Religious Conspiracy Against the Republic." He began by stating that his lecture was not an A. P. A. lecture, although he was in sympathy with some of the principles of that order, but gave his attentiv audience to understand that he regarded some of the planks in the A. P. A. platform as a very weak, wishy-washy bait to catch the unwary Infidel; for instance, where they say in their epitome of principles that "we are in favor of church taxation, except the church edifices," and that makes it a factor in the great religious conspiracy against the Republic. Then Mr. Steiner ventilated the high Catholic authority on the free public school system of the United States, and he critically examined the edicts and encyclical letters and orders of the popes and it was proven to the satisfaction of any fair-minded and reasonable person that the Catholic hierarchy or church is a very powerful and dangerous conspiracy against this republic. Up to this stage of the lecture Mr. Steiner had not said much about the Protestants and if there were any in the audience they no doubt thought they were going to escape, but if they did they were sadly mistaken, for Mr. Steiner turned his attention to the Protestants and mercilessly and scathingly arraigned them and their leaders before the bar of public opinion. He paid particular attention to Rev. W. F. Crafts, the Women's Christian Temperance Union, the Prohibition and God-in-the-Constitution parties, and when he closed the lecture it had been proven that the Protestant churches were and are a very activ, unrelenting, and unscrupulous power in the great religious conspiracy against this republic.

Yours for Universal Mental Liberty,

G. G. BECK.

A Preacher's Unfortunate Comparison.

NEW HAMPTON, IA., April 22, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: On the 20th and 21st of April the Liberals of this town and vicinity enjoyed, and the Christians deplored, the appearance of John R. Charlesworth, who gave two lectures in the opera house. I will state that the shot used by Mr. Charlesworth are square chunks, with sharp corners, by the side of which the round and smooth little fellows used by less daring mental Nimrods look quite inoffensiv. On the morning following the last lecture, Christians and hypocrits, seconded by a few skim-milk Liberals, complained in variously pitched voices that the missils (square chunks) produced unnecessarily painful wounds. The fact of the matter, as I take it, is that this community is not yet sufficiently emancipated (evoluted) from mental slavery. The fearless and aggressiv defender of liberty, of justice, of reason, of fact as against fiction, surprised his listeners. They were carried away by the intrepidity of the speaker. None of the audience had, even by correspondence, any acquaintance with him except the writer and Mrs. G. W. Wise, the energetic lady who engaged Mr. Charlesworth, gathered in the shekels and made all arrangements for the lectures—to her we owe thanks for all the good which may result from these lectures. She has decided to repeat the experiment in the near future. Good!

Less than two hundred attended the first lecture, weather being very disagreeable. On the second night we had a good turnout, but to me the most promising feature was the presence of many ladies. They were not a sprinkling in the audience, but a noticeable contingent of it. This is highly gratifying, because it shows that our wives, mothers, and daughters need not ask for providential (clerical) dispensation in order to hear something new to most of them; they are learning to stand on their own feet. The best of order prevailed throughout.

One preacher accepted the invitation to speak. He said: "Sam Jones tells of a man who had a loaded gun. Discovering a number of dogs on the street he blazed away at them. Every dog hit set up a howl." Continuing, he said: "I am hit hard and several times." This is, perchance, not exactly verbatim, but as nearly so as I can remember it. He asserted that Christians had been persecuted by Infidels and skeptics from the very inception of Christianity down to the present. His acquaintance with history seems to be below zero, or else veracity is to him an unknown quantity. But the enthusiastic and venturesome would-be critic received from Mr. Charlesworth an abundance of mind-food. It will last him for some time, and it will benefit him if he is able and willing to digest it.

Mr. Henry Bisson, of Riceville, Ia., a TRUTH SEEKER reader, traveled nearly thirty miles, and spent two days, to hear for the first time a Liberal lecturer. He returned home highly pleased.

Yours for the gospel of humanity,

F. L. DAUBERSMITH.

Snake and Rainbow.

JACKSONVILLE, ILL., June 4, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Regarding the two subjects, revelation and natural science, it seems rather surprising that some writers of reputation should attempt to effect a reconciliation between them, for they evidently agree about as well as a dog and a cat would living together in the same kennel. On the subject of snake and rainbow the question might be asked, What qualities hav they in common? The answer is, Nothing at all, except that both are ready to be called as witnesses in the court of common sense to prove that the Bible can not be relied on for veracity. According to geology, the lapse of time since the reptilian period was immeasurably far in excess of the six thousand years computed by theologians since the creation of the world. In the account given the incommoding manner of "crawling on his belly" was a curse, inconvenience, or penance (should hav been a pension) as a punishment inflicted on the snake for having indulged in a little flirtation with our reputed antique female progenitor, Mother Eve, which resulted in pruning her of her maximum growth of robust ignorance and engrafting the scion of priceless, alluring truth instead.

Has the reader ever seen a fossil snake? On nearly the full length of the abdomen are a series of transverse parallel bars, which were, while living, its organs of locomotion instead of legs. Now, from the scriptural account one would naturally infer that before the alleged curse snakes had some other way of going besides "crawling on their bellies." During the era of reptils the land and waters literally swarmed with snake-like monsters who were "monarchs of all they surveyed," and dictated the policy of government, figurativly speaking, to all else. But their authority could hav been derived from sheer brute force alone and not from superior mental sagacity as stated in Genesis. Those primeval autocrats hav passed away, and left only their liliputian descendants of the present time. And from their history recorded in the imperishable rocks science has been able to read something of their size, shape, and number. Thev hav left their fossilized forms perpetuated in enduring stone, and we can see from their structural formation that they "crawled on their bellies" long before the time of fabled Adam and Eve.

The rainbow next needs our attention. The Bible says the Lord placed it in the firmament as a pledge or token that he would no more destroy sublunary life by means of water. Now, any text-book of natural philosophy will explain the why and wherefore of the phenomenon of the rainbow to be nothing more nor less than the analysis of sunlight—solar spectrum—and could never occur if the falling drops of rain were not spherical and transparent. Having confidence in the uniformity and perpetuity of nature's laws we are induced to believe the antediluvians were provided with rainbows identical with those which embellish our skies at the present day, else raindrops hav been modified in shape since the deluge, which admits of no more credence than the aforesaid moss-back traditions.

WM. PATTERSON.

A Correction and Some Averments.

LOCUST CORNER, O., June 24, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: My TRUTH SEEKER of June 16th arrived on time, and I see that I did friend George an injustice. He is not an editor; he is simply a correspondent who frequently reviews the communications of other correspondents before they are published. His explanation is satisfactory and I hope he will accept my apology. I perceive also that Mr. George has his opinion of my "trinity of acquaintances." That opinion is not the only delusion under which he is laboring, and though rather uncomplimentary to me is unworthy of refutation.

Personally I will say that I hav "assured the editor of my distinguished regard" in a way that he is most likely to appreciate, that of having been a paid in advance subscriber for eighteen years. I took the paper many years through an agent, then two years directly from the office, after which, for reasons satisfactory to myself, I changed back to the old plan. I hav received nearly a thousand copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, not one of which came without the cash, never having borrowed a single one. Friend George will therefore hav to change his personal attacks to some other basis. My name is not on the editor's subscription list, but it is on his book list to some extent.

Had our friend characterized the protective tariff as a national blessing, he would hav shown a much better understanding of the subject, but I should hav considered even that as very imprudent on his part, and should hav been inclined to "raise a warning voice."

Friend George concludes this note with a statement that his view of the protectiv tariff embraces a trinity of right, honesty, and common sense. This naturally recalls a paragraph in the issue of May 19th, in which we are informed that "it cannot of course be maintained that the employee is benefited by the protectiv tariff, because there is free trade in labor." We look for the trinity which our friend has modestly introduced, and we find the first exceedingly vague, the last entirely missing. To question the second would, of course, be very uncharitable; to grant it, absolutely cruel, for the man who can honestly and seriously write such a paragraph for publication, is certainly to be pitied.

Here is an assertion which is untrue and absurd: "Because there is free trade in labor." A reason which is false to the core. A reason than which no religious dogma could be more silly, and of which any child of fifteen years should be ashamed. Under a protectiv tariff, there is no free trade in labor. The benefits of the tariff are about equally divided between the employee and the consumer. The former gets more money for his labor and the latter more goods for his money. In other words, wages are higher and living cheaper.

This may seem paradoxical to the narrow intellect of a free trader; but if his reason were allowed to expand a little, he would see that Europe can sell more cheaply than we, but that Europe will not sell cheaply as we do, unless compelled to do so by a tariff.

Under free trade rule, European producers will lower prices until American competition is destroyed, after which they will charge what they like and America is bound to pay. A protectiv tariff renders such work impossible. Free trade givs Europe a monopoly of the American markets, allows foreigners to fix prices which American consumers are obliged to pay. Protection enables American competition to defeat foreign monopolies, to fix prices which Europe is bound to accept or keep her goods at home.

I do not expect to convince friend George. Paine in his day perceived the uselessness of giving medicin to the dead; and when we find a man, an American, who can in sober earnest declare that the employee is not benefited by the protectiv tariff because there is free trade in labor, we hav no choice, but to conclude that the words of Paine were never more justly applicable.

Jesus and Thomas Paine.

CLINT, TEX., June 10, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1.50, for which send THE TRUTH SEEKER to my friend S. Shulz for six months, at the end of which time, I doubt not, he will hav acquired such an appetite for its pages of common sense, sound philosophy, and scientific truth that he will be a subscriber for the remainder of his life.

The last issue of the paper was a splendid tribute to the memory of that grand man, Thomas Paine. When I was a boy in the city of Mobile, I well remember that there was a man who was pointed out by the pious parsons and religious zealots as a dangerous member of the community because he had read and admired the writings of Thomas Paine, and made no concealment of the fact. It is not quite so bad now, but still what a disgrace it is to this United States of America that the pioneer promoter of the liberties we now enjoy; the man who fired the hearts of the colonists with that spirit of resistance which enabled them after years of battle and bloodshed to throw off the British yoke; the brave genius who in Europe flung the "Rights or Man" in the face of despotic royalty and power, and for the first time taught the toiling, groaning, sweating millions that they had rights which not even a God, much less a vile government of men, could trample upon with impunity; the lover of his kind, who, while despising monarchy, voted in France to spare the life of the monarch when he knew that it meant for him the prison and likely the gullotin—that such a man should hav been reviled and cursed for a century by the people to whom he gave a Republican form of government because he wrote the "Age of Reason" to liberate their darkened minds from superstition and priestcraft, while a hypothetical, non-historic member of a barbarous race, who, it is said, lived some two thousand years ago, and went about denouncing pharisees and cursing fig-trees for not bearing fruit out of season; breaking into c rnfields and helping himself and his party to what they had no right to; grabbing another man's burros and riding into Jerusalem followed by a lot of commonwealers whom he taught to take no thought for the morrow, promising that their heavenly father would put up for them; to love their enemies, hate father and mother and follow him; in short, to act the fool throughout in this world, and he would fix them up nicely in some other world; that such a fictitious personage or moral crank—if he ever existed—should hav a billion dollars of untaxed property in this country dedicated to his name and millions of admiring voters, while Thomas Paine, who lived, loved, and suffered for his fellowmen, not thirty but seventy years, and left his imperishable thoughts to all posterity, is hated by the multitude and appreciated and honored by only the intelligent and liberal few, makes me somewhat disgusted with the human race and especially the so-called religious portion of it, which wishes now to put this mythical Hebrew in the Constitution of the United States, declare him king, and then make laws to compel us all to go to church and worship their king and support his priests. Let anyone follow literally the example and teachings of this Christ and he will land in the poorhouse or lunatic asylum inside of six months. Let any one follow the example and teachings of Thomas Paine, and he will be loved and honored wherever intelligence and virtue, divorced from superstition, hold sway over the minds and hearts of men and women.

But we know very well how it is. The sky-pilots in general—to be sure there are exceptions—don't giv a continental for Christ as a teacher, and are very careful to avoid following his example; but his name and the constant conjuring with it bring them the coveted easy living and the respect of their miguided, mistaken admirers. And the more churches and priests and parsons, the worse the nation seems to be getting. "When was age so crammed with menaces, madness, written, spoken lies?" asked Tennyson, in bitterness of soul. Greed for gold is fast destroying the morals of the nation; justice and virtue are at a discount, while Christ, Carlisle, and the sugar and other trusts are running the state and grabbing for everything in sight. Senators, at an average cost to the people annually of $16,482 (see Hepburn's "Statements in the House") apiece, come high. Most all are good Christians, with a holy chaplain at their head to steer them heavenward, but they practically demonstrate the utility of the proverb, "a bird in hand is worth two in the bush"—sugar stocks and corner lots on earth every time when these cost only a vote. Mansions in the skies Jesus will giv them in the hereafter.

If Not Christianity, What?

Because of man's wickedness, God will not destroy him.
God's attributes are revealed in his word.
God's attributes cannot be discovered.
There is but one God.
There are more Gods than one.

These contradictory propositions destroy each other, therefore the holy Bible destroys the holy Bible God. The holy Bible God is the most viewless, doless, helpless thing in the universe. You can see the horse, cow, dog, bird, worm, microbe, but the holy Bible God does not show up. You can get the help of the most insignificant thing an earth, but the help of the holy Bible God comes not. The avalanche sweeps down the Infidel and Christian, the good and bad, the virtuous and vicious go alike. Disease and famin come, all share alike The holy Bible God always does the work through the most thorough scientists. The holy Bible God signally fails in the hands of quacks. In Spain today they fight cholera with long processions, marching, headed by bishops, cardinals, priests bearing crucifixes; praying, praising, promising, prevailing the holy Bible God, yet cholera moves on, sweeping down unheeded by the helpless holy Bible God, who is off making for a new planet a savior and devil to save and damn its inhabitants.

When Garfield was shot, the Christian world agonized in sincere and hopeful prayer for weeks, for his life—he died. The holy Bible God would hav been successful had the surgeon's knife reached the fatal bullet; but as it was, the holy Bible God failed. When the yellow fever visited the Mississippi valley, millions of sincere and hopeful prayers went up, week after week, for months, to the holy Bible God to remove the plague, but it stayed until the frost of winter froze it out, then the shout of thankful joy rose to heaven for the answer to prayer by the holy Bible God. In America they fight contagious epidemics with common sense, reason, science; with drugs, mattock, grub-hoe, pickaxe, spade, shovel, hoe, rake, scraper, soap, lye, potash, acid, mop, broom, fire, quarantine, extermination, fooling no time away with the helpless holy Bible God. Intelligence always exerts itself, and givs credit where credit is due. The ignorant are induced to do differently and suffer.

Who is the holy Bible Christ? The holy Bible Christ is the holy Bible God—the son of the holy Bible God, the son of his holy self, the son of the holy ghost, the son of the holy Bible Joseph. Matthew states that the holy Bible Jacob begat the holy Bible Josepb, the husband of the holy Bible Mary. Luke states that the holy Bible Joseph was the son of the holy Bible Heli.

These holy Bible contradictions annihilate themselvs, and both the holy Bible Christ and the holy Bible Joseph. Therefore, by these holy Bible contradictions, we hav no holy Bible God, no holy Bible Joseph, and no holy Bible Mary.

The whole Christian religion rests on a dream. The holy Bible Joseph thought he married a holy Bible virgin. It was different. It troubled the holy Bible Joseph so much that he dreamed. The holy Bible Mary knew, but she did not tell. The holy Bible Joseph told his dream, and upon that dream rests the eternal future of all mankind; a dream which challenges credulity, reason, and common sense, and this we are to believe or be damned. Who believes it? Who will not be damned?

The holy Bible says that the holy Bible children shall not eat anything that dieth of itself, but feed it to their guests or sell it to strangers. The holy Bible says: "Punish the children to the third and fourth generation for the sins of the parent." The holy Bible Christ says he brought not peace but a sword. The holy Bible says women must be silent, hold their speech, be governed by their husbands, and if they want to know anything they must ask their husbands; if the husband don't know, be ignorant; if they hav no husband, then they are given over to the lust of the holy Bible king, holy Bible priest, or holy Bible soldier, and when their brutality is satisfied, they may be driven out on the unfriendly world to seek shelter, food, and a home where best they can, unthought of, uncared for, vagrants. The holy Bible Christ says you must hate father, mother, sister, and brother, or you are not a Christian. The holy Bible Christ says you must sell all you hav and give it to the poor. The holy Bible Christ says blessed are the poor. Woe unto the rich. All the virtue Lazarus had was poverty; he died and went to heaven. All the vice the rich man had was riches; he died and went to hell. The holy Bible Christ says you must not make provision for future wants, but trust to the holy Bible God. The holy Bible Christ says if you lend ask it not again. The holy Bible Christ says if any one takes your property, pursue him not, but giv him more of your valuables. The holy Bible Christ says resist not evil. The holy Bible Christ says if any one forces you to go against your will, yield without complaint. The holy Bible Christ says if any one strikes you, let him strike again. The holy Bible Christ teaches the doctrin of non-resistance to evil. The holy Bible sustains slavery, polygamy, murder of heretics, pope or king rule, submission to all rulers, destruction of witches.

All the foregoing are fundamentally taught in the holy Bible—the word of the holy Bible God. They are the teachings of the holy Bible Christ—the holy utterances of heaven's holy Bible king; the inspired word of the holy Bible God—the unerring guide. Do Christians follow and teach these fundamentals? They do not. What do they follow and teach? They follow and teach the laws of the several states in which they liv, the holy Bible God, the holy Bible Christ, the holy Bible, the holy Bible pope, the holy Bible priest, or the holy Bible laity to the contrary notwithstanding. The statutes define our duty as men and women, father and mother, parent and child, brother and sister, guardian and ward, neighbor and citizen. They guard our health, customs, dealings, persons, and property. They direct everything that pertains to this life and is tending toward the great, grand scale of equal rights and compel obedience.

The statutes are in direct opposition to the teachings of the holy Bible, the holy Bible God, the holy Bible Christ. In place of Christianity what? We hav no Christianity as taught by the holy Bible—we dare not follow or teach its fundamentals. The law forbids. The statutes of the several states are the verified experience of mankind, periodically changed, as wisdom makes it necessary for our good; and professed Christians assist in enacting and enforcing these Infidel laws for the security of their lives, property, and persons, and which over-ride the authority of the holy Bible God, the holy Bible Christ, and the holy Bible.

The holy Bible priesthood persist in the falsehood that all our laws are based on the teachings of the holy Bible. The statutes are the Infidel Bible, and there is not a man, woman, or child who does not find protection in them and believe in them, and by so doing they are Infidels.

How was it in the holy Bible days of the dark ages, when all books, except the holy Bible, were burned, and all thoughts which were not in accordance with the holy Bible were crucified and Freethinkers burned? How was it in the holy Bible days of the Catholic Inquisition? In Spain alone 31,000 were burned, 290,000 were tortured to death by frying; and in the Netherlands 75,000 went down in horrible death? These figures record only a small portion of those who perished or suffered for the "crime" of heresy; the offenders' wives, children, relativs, friends—all were doomed for the sake of the holy Bible God. How was it in the holy Bible days of the Protestant persecution in Europe? It was a parallel to the Inquisition (read William Cobbett's letter to Lord Tenderten, chief justice of England, as late as 1829, in Bell's "Hand-book of Freethought"). How was it in the holy Bible days of America? Read the Blue Laws, the persecution, the hanging of witches. Those were days of stocks, chains, fetters, dungeons, prisons, fire, fagot, flame, sword, cannon, rack, thumbscrew, strangulation, gibbet, river of human blood, brutal, beastly, priestly, religious, holy Bible unquiet. Who would not rather hav the Infidel present than the holy Bible days of the past? Infidels want nothing, ask for nothing, but protection in the exercise of their natural rights—free thought, free speech, right of private judgment, equality before the law. They wish to entertain their own opinion of and scorn for the deceiver who robs the widow and orphan of their mite for the holy Bible God's sake, and who livs untaxed in luxury on their beggary.

We want no horrid holy Bible days of the past. We want no holy Bible, no holy Bible God in the Constitution. We don't want any holy Bible Sunday; we don't want any holy Bible days again—no repetition of the holy Bible past; we want the Infidel present with its aspiration for a better Infidel future as verification shall point the way.

Christian, abandon the self-executed holy Bible myths, the holy Bible God, the holy Bible Christ, the holy Bible Holy Ghost, the holy Bible Joseph, the holy Bible Mary, the holy Bible dream, the holy Bible devil, and come with us; we will turn the light of reason on truth, justice, humanity and giv you a chance for peace, earthly quiet, a happy eternity.

Christians, you hav poisoned with your holy Bible the fountain of the stream of time and built a wall of sulphureous damnation and set a guard of flaming swords about it; you hav added deadlines to its inlets and, as it widened, deepened, length ened toward the great ocean of the unknown, you increased its perils and horrified its navigation so that its descent was almost certain death and caused many of its voyagers such mental horror that they scuttled their craft and sank to rise no more. You held the fortress, armed with all the implements of horrid death known to brutal man. With will and nerve, backed by the command of the holy Bible God to execute, you executed.

Thus ticked the clock of time, when high up and far out of this horrid night nations bore and cradled some great, grand, good, heroic souls, who saw that the present gloom and woe needed an antidote and changed the bubbling fountain, bettered its inlets, and made navigation more possible, and life happier; they broke through the hellish wall and flaming guards and cast into the fountain the needed gift. They saw, they knew to do was death—death to them, but life to future voyagers; this nerved their will and forced them to the deed; it was done; the stream was bettered, but the heroic souls were gone. Their noble work told and still speaks; others died by your cruel butchery until it was made possible for men to do, think, speak, and yet liv. The great barriers on the stream of time are gone. Those now borne on its bosom begin to pluck the fruits of truth, justice, happiness, peace, Freethought, right of private judgment along its banks and view the beyond as a home of eternal rest.

Your deeds are recorded as infamous; their deeds as unfading goodness, greatness, and will shine on and on and on—grow brighter, brighter, brighter as the ages pass.

If you want quotations and references touching all the Bible contradictions alluded to and many more holy Bible crushers send fifteen cents to the Truth Seeker Company.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Legend of Evil.

This is the sorrowful story
Told when the twilight fails
And the monkeys walk together
Holding each other's tails.

"Our fathers lived in the forest,
Foolish people were they,
They went down in the cornland
To teach the farmers to play.

"Our fathers frisked in the millet,
Our fathers skipped in the wheat,
Our fathers hung in the branches,
Our fathers danced in the street.

"Then came the terrible farmers,
Nothing of play they knew,
Only they caught our fathers
And set them to labor too!

"Set them to work in the cornland
With plows and sickles and flails,
Put them in mud-walled prisons
And—cut off their beautiful tails!

"Now we can watch our fathers
Sullen and bowed and old,
Stooping over the millet,
Sharing the silly mold.

"Driving a foolish furrow,
Mending a muddy yoke,
Sleeping in mud-walled prisons,
Steeping their food in smoke.

"We may not speak of our fathers,
For if the farmers knew,
They would come up to the forest
And set us to labor too."

This is the horrible story
Told as the twilight fails
And the monkeys walk together
Holding each other's tails.

A Visit to Salt Lake City.

Right here I may remark that we traveled through a more extensiv wilderness in less than forty hours (thirty-six) than Moses and the children of Israel did in forty years, consequently modern civilization, as far as traveling is concerned, must be vastly superior to ancient inspiration. But the modern traveler must not think that he, like the children of Israel, will be fed with manna from heaven. Should he patronize the dining-car attached to his train or any of the dining-halls at the various depots where the train stops, which he is necessarily compelled to do, he will find that repeated and excessiv demands are made upon his pocket for what he may require in the way of food while traveling through the great desert of North America. Three o'clock in the morning is an untimely hour to arrive in a strange city; we were, therefore, with a few other passengers, escorted to the waiting-room at the depot to await the coming dawn. Having now arrived at the place that I had often wished to see, and being anxious to view the new surroundings, I looked and longed for daybreak to appear, and at length Aurora came.

Awake! arise from slumbers deep;
Behold, Aurora comes
To break the fettered chains of sleep
From powers which sleep benumbs;

While still, in purpled shadows hid,
The sleeping valley lies,
With kisses soft each drowsing lid
Is ope'd in sweet surprise.

She comes all winged, with glowing beams,
And tresses hung with gold;
Her radiant face with gladness gleams;
She smiles on young and old.

Light skipping o'er the towering peaks,
Like bounding mountain fawn,
She comes all fresh with blushing cheeks—
The bright and laughing dawn.

Fly, Erebus, black bird of night,
Hence with thy motley train;
Aurora comes on wings of light,
Earth wakes to life again.

Daylight brings to view an extensiv blooming valley with a beautiful city of sixty-five thousand inhabitants nestling in its bosom. The city is located near the foot of the northern and eastern range of mountains, or perhaps it would be more correct to say, in the northeast corner of the valley, the mountains to the south being twenty-five miles distant. Stretching out for a considerable distance to the southwest is a level plain leading to the Great Salt Lake, which is nineteen miles distant from the city, and is reached by the Salt Lake and Los Angeles railway. There are three railway depots in the city and street cars propelled by electricity run in all directions. The streets are one hundred and thirty feet wide, some of which are well paved and streams of sparkling clear water from the surrounding mountains course along the sides of very many of them.

Suburban streets are adorned on each side with beautiful residences, having beautiful lawns, shrubbery, flowers, etc., all of which appear to be kept in the very best order, while tall shade trees protect them from the rays of the summer sun. In the business part of the city all trades, professions, and occupations seem to be well represented, from the cobbler mending shoes, and the second-hand furniture dealer, to the princely merchant whose store is filled to its utmost capacity with everything useful and ornamental.

Salt Lake City indicates a degree of comfort and prosperity which is probably not excelled by any city of its size in the United States. Saturday afternoon, Aug. 26th, we take a trip to Saltair Beach, Salt Lake, where a great multitude of people were assembled to listen to two concerts to be given during the afternoon and evening in the new pavilion there by the Mormon Tabernacle choir, consisting of two hundred and fifty voices. The Pavilion is a splendid frame structure built on the lake four thousand feet from the shore. It rests upon large wooden posts or piling raised a few feet above the surface of the water, and trains reach it by means of a viaduct extending from the shore to the building. It contains a lunch or dining hall 151 by 253 feet, a concert and dance-hall 140 by 250 feet, 620 bath houses, and several high towers which afford a commanding view of the lake and surrounding mountains.

Correspondence.

SALEM, O., April 23, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Mr. Sharp, the gentleman with whose family my mamma and I are living, takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. They hav persuaded me to write to the Children's Corner. I hav read a great many letters to the Corner and think they are very nice. I go to the Columbia street school. There are eight rooms. I am in the sixth room. I am thirteen years of age and an only child. This is all for this time. Yours truly, OPHELIA DAVIS.

HEBER CITY, April 16, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav never written to the Corner, so I thought I would write. My pa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for a long time. I like to read the Children's Corner very much. I am twelve years old. I go to school and read in the Fourth Reader. I study reading, writing, spelling and physiology. We hav a mile and a half to walk to school. There is only one more week. Well, I guess my letter is long enough, so I will close, hoping to see this in print. From your friend,

JANIE BELLE LINDSAY.

HEBER CITY, April 15, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I was pleased to see my letter in priut, so I thought I would write again. You told me next time I wrote to describe the town where I lived. It is situated on a creek. The houses are strung along on either side for about three miles and a half, everybody living on their own farm. Pa has read THE TRUTH SEEKER for fifteen years. I hav four sisters and one brother. My brother's name is Thomas Paine. We are all Freethinkers. Well, I guess my letter is long enough. From your little friend,

CHRISTEENA LINDSAY.

[The next time you write, Christeena, tell us what state you liv in.—ED. C. C.]

WEST SUTTON, MASS., May 20, E.M. 294.

DEAR MISS WIXON: With your permission I would like to communicate with the members of our Correspondence Club through the Corner.

We hav a club of twenty-eight members at present. About the first of April I sent a list of the names of the members to each one that they might vote for officers, and having received ballots from only about half of the members I think there may possibly be some misunderstanding. In the February 10th issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER the plan of the club was given. It was stated that two officers should perform the duties of the club-president and secretary, chosen for a term of three months. The duty of the president is to name the correspondents, and, with the advice of the secretary, appoint the subjects.

The president shall receive all correspondence, which must be forwarded to him within two weeks after receipt of the same, and he shall send one letter in each series of letters to the secretary for publication.

The secretary shall notify each member of the club with whom to correspond and upon what subjects, and publish in the Liberal papers any correspondence the president may send.

I hope that all those members who hav not sent their ballots will do so at their earliest leisure or convenience. Yours for Freethought, LUCY W. PHELPS.

PARIS, TEX., May 24, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I will try to write one letter to the Corner. I read the Corner every week. I think that THE TRUTH SEEKER is the best paper that I ever read. The Corner is the most interesting page in it. We liv several miles from Paris, the county seat of Lamar. The city has a population of ten thousand and about fifteen churches. There are several Freethinkers here. The lecture of J. E. Remsburg was very highly appreciated. I will tell you my age—fourteen. I hav two brothers and four sisters. My youngest brother is named Volney Voltaire Bradley and my next eldest brother is named Robert Heston Bradley. I wish long life to Watson Heston. I remain yours for truth and liberty.

EUSTACE EUGENE BRADLEY.

P. S.—You need not write all my name. If some of the children would write I would gladly answer. E. E. B.

MARSH, IDA., May 21, 294.

DEAR MISS WIXON AND READERS OF THE CORNER: I thought I would address you once more and let you know that I am still alive and prospering. I am busy mining now, and I am to get seventy-five cents every Sunday, but sometimes I rest a half day on Sunday and read THE TRUTH SEEKER. I attended a debating society at Horse Shoe Bend, which is about eight miles from here. The meetings were held every Wednesday night. One night the question was, Resolved, That Female Suffrage should be allowed. There was but one man who spoke earnestly on the negativ side. He went back to the Bible and quoted several passages, and said we ought to follow the Bible. But another man on the affirmativ knocked him out entirely, and said that this was a later date than when the Bible was written. Easter Sunday services were held here, and they rung me in to take part and it made me hot. Next time I will be on the watch and they won't catch me so easily. The preacher was absent but sent a substitute. He got up and spoke about the Africans and the Mexicans, how they were trying to find the Lord, but he couldn't see why the Americans were so backward but still more civilized. That also made me hot. Why, anybody that had common sense might know why they were so backward in joining the church. As I will probably be taking up too much valuable space I will close. Yours for Freethought and reform,

A. E. BENOIT.

APOLLONIUS OF TYANA IDENTIFIED AS THE CHRISTIAN JESUS.

An important and remarkable revelation concerning the life and times of Apollonius of Tyana, the great sage and philosopher of the first century. It is here claimed that his life and teachings were appropriated and utilized by the formulators of the Christian religion in the interest of so-called Christianity. The plagiarism is made plain in this brief history of Apollonius, especailly in view of the historical references and comments thereon. It is quite evident that to conceal the plagiarism, the name of Apollonius was suppressed.

CHEAP EDITION.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

Just Out.—25 Cents—Five Copies for $1.

A Liberal living in Michigan said once that he would give $25 a year to have the Crimes of Preachers recorded, as the frequent lapses of virtue of the ministers showed how little value Christianity possesses to make men moral.

We have just issued the Fourth Edition of the book doing this. The additions for this new edition of the

"Crimes of Preachers"

gives nearly 400 cases of ministerial conduct. While those in previous editions show that within a few years about of one kind or another of criminal conduct. Most of the crimes are against women, for the fair sex are at once the weakness and the strength of the church—"the church" meaning of course the clergy.

Notwithstanding the many additional pages, we have kept the price the same, 25 cents. Send for a copy, and confound the churchmen. Show them just what sort of scamps are the clergy who have closed the World's Fair on Sunday, because it is so holy a day that to look upon machinery or paintings in this period is "immoral."

PEN PICTURES OF THE WORLD'S FAIR.

By SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

It is, besides being a complete Guide-Book, the best description of the Fair yet given—poetic, beautiful, accurate. It describes the inauguration ceremonies, gives the director-general's address, the efforts to close the Fair Sundays and the triumph of the Sunday-openers; describes the various buildings and what they contain, and is, all in all, the very best picture of the Fair that can be painted with a pen.

RELIGION A CURSE, RELIGION A DISEASE, RELIGION A LIE.

By Samuel P. Putnam.

Dedicated to the American Congress, of 1892. which for the sake of Religion, Stabbed Liber to the Heart.

A work burning with indignation inspired by the Congressional act closing the World's Fair on Sunday—an act which practically united the government and the Christian church.

To which is added Mr. Putnam's address delivered before the Columbian Exposition Committee of the House of Representatives against Sunday closing.

Also the following Essays and Poems by Mr. Putnam, which have never before been put in book form: Orthodoxy; Freethought; Man, Not God (written for a Paine anniversary); The Statue of Liberty and Thomas Paine; a poem written for the opening exercises of the Silverton, Ore., Freethought Hall; Death and Life; The Golden Age; Shut the Door (a poem on the closing of the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia, in 1876).

The main essay in this work is one of the strongest arraignments ever made of the religion which cramps and fetters the minds of the people of this country. It should be distributed widely It has been commended in the highest terms as it appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER and we hope every reader will buy a copy to lend his neighbor and arouse thought.

SCIENCE AND CHRISTIAN TRADITION. Essays. By Thomas H. Huxley. New York: D. Appleton & Co. Cloth. Price, $1.25.

"Science and Christian Tradition" is Number Five in the series of Professor Huxley's collected essays, immediately following "Science and Hebrew Tradition," noticed some weeks ago in these columns. In the preface to the present volume the author observes that he has reached the time when "the still small voice" within, "more audible than any other to the dulled ear of age, makes its demand; and I hav found that it is no sort of use to try to cook the accounts rendered." He has striven to tell the truth, in so far as he has been able to discover it, in regard to the questions which giv the titles to the work before us and its companion volume, just mentioned. Nevertheless, or perhaps rather because of this desire to tell only the truth, he is impelled to deny the validity of some of the charges made against him by Christian critics, particularly those which assume that he has "gone out of his way" to attack the Bible and the church or that he is inspired by "hatred of Christianity." His has always been the work of the scientific investigator, and it was only when the "dominant ecclesiasticism" of his early days "thrust the book" [the Bible] in his way that he found it necessary to point out certain facts which are very annoying to Christian apologists. Wherever he went in the province of natural knowlege which he had set out to explore, he "came to a tall and formidable-looking fence." On this was the prohibitiv notice—"No thoroughfare. By order. Moses." He could see no way over the fence; and the "prospect of creeping round" did not seem as attractiv to him as it does to some others. "True there was no longer any cause to fear the spring guns and man-traps set by former lords of the manor; but one is apt to get very dirty going on all-fours." We can fully appreciate the sturdy Englishman's fastidiousness when we take a look at some of the respectable "reconcilers" who hav been trying to get into the promised land of truth by sneaking through the morasses of Christian apologetics. They are wretchedly bedraggled, and their spines hav become so accustomed to the attitude of the quadrumana or of the ophidians that they ever afterward find it extremely difficult if not wholly impossible to resume the erect position of the genus homo. So Professor Huxley found himself reduced to the alternativ of abandoning his journey or breaking down the fence and going through. It is not necessary to say which to chose to do. His life work tells the story.

Professor Huxley remarks that he is by nature law-abiding, "ready and willing to submit to all legitimate authority," but he was always possessed of the conviction that "reasonable assurance of the legitimacy [of the authority] should precede submission," so he took it upon himself "to look up the manorial title-deeds. The pretensions of the ecclesiastical 'Moses' to exercise a control over the operations of the reasoning faculty in the search after truth, thirty centuries after his age, might be justifiable; but, assuredly, the credentials produced in justification of claims so large required careful scrutiny." Instituting an examination of these credentials—the Bible—the scientist made some "singular discoveries." "Moses" he found to be "a mere traditional mask." Probably there lay behind this mask the features of a real man—"just as many a medieval fresco has been hidden by the whitewash of Georgian churchwardens," but after the "successiv layers of Jewish and Christian traditional pigment" had been removed, by "even the tenderest critical operations, there was not much to be discerned of the leader of the Exodus."

Yet one fact stood out clearly, and that was that for nine-tenths of the Pentateuch Moses was in no was to be praised or blamed, "certainly not for the legends which hav been made the bugbears of science." The fence "turned out to be a mere heap of sticks and brushwood" through which the Professor could and did walk with impunity. He was young then, he remarks, and was naturally indignant that such a sham had been put in his way. One's vanity, he thinks, is likely to be hurt when great preparations hav been made to go through or climb over a rampart "which turns out, on close approach, to be a mere heap of ruins; venerable, indeed, and archeologically interesting, but of no other moment." A portion of "the surplus energy accumulated is apt to find vent in strong language." Still, after the lapse of thirty years, Professor Huxley cannot see his way clear to modify the statements he made in his essay, "On the Origin of Species," written in 1860. He perceives that "the cosmogony of the semi-barbarous Hebrew" has not ceased to be the "incubus of the philosopher and the opprobrium of the orthodox," and not yet "are the weaker sort, even of the instructed, at rest from their fruitless toil 'to harmonize impossibilities.'"

But the field of conflict is not wholly the same that it was three decades ago. Then "criticism of 'Moses' was held by most respectable people to be deadly sin; now it has sunk to the rank of a mere peccadillo; at least, if it stops short of the history of Abraham." You may knock out all the foundations of Christianity, as they were once found in Genesis, and the new apologists will "underpin the structure" and make it "to the eye as firm as ever."

"But let him be anathema who applies exactly the same canons of criticism to the opening chapters of 'Matthew' or of 'Luke.' School-children may be told that the world was by no means made in six days, and that implicit belief in the story of Noah's Ark is permissible only, as a matter of business, to their toy-makers; but they are to hold for the certainest of truths, to be doubted only at peril of their salvation, that their Galilean fellow-child Jesus, nineteen centuries ago, had no human father."

From this point on the preface is a summary of the well-known historical, literary and scientific arguments against the claims commonly made by Christians for the four gospels, stated as only Professor Huxley can state them. Following the preface, the contents are: Prologue; Scientific and Pseudo-Scientific Realism [1887]; Science and Pseudo-Science [1887]; An Episcopal Trilogy [1887]; the Value of Witness to the Miraculous [1889]; Possibilities and Impossibilities [1891]; Agnosticism [1889]; Agnosticism: A Rejoinder [1889]; Agnosticism and Christianity [1889]; The Keepers of the Herd of Swine [1890]; Illustrations of Mr. Gladstone's Controversial Methods [1891].

Not for Parsons.

THE meek must inherit the earth, for it's plain they never could get it in any other way.—Kate Field's Washington.

THE pastor had no dislike to the choir, but some of its members were almost ready to resign, not long ago, on account of one of his announcements. So many of them were sick that the choir seats were deserted. The good man was sorry for it, but the idea uppermost in his mind was to choose a hymn that the entire congregation could sing. He mentioned the absence of the choir, and then said: "Since providence has seen fit to afflict them with bad colds, let us join in singing 'Praise God from whom all blessings flow."

ANOTHER minister of the last century famed for his peculiar prayers was the Rev. Peter Glass, the minister of Crail. The Rev. Peter invariably preached and prayed in good broad Scotch, using all the homely technical terms appropriate to the subjects he happened to hav in hand. His parishioners being mostly fishermen, he was praying one day "that the Lord would fill the men's boats wi' herrin' up to the very towholes" (i. e., rowlocks), when one of the persons concerned roared out: "Na, na, no' that far, sir, or we wad a' be sunk!" —Saladin.

AN old minister in the Cheviots used, when excited in the pulpit, to raise his voice to a loud half-whimper, half whine. One day a shepherd had brought with him a young collie, who became so thrilled by the high note of the preacher that he also broke into a quaver so like the other that the minister stopped short. "Put out that collie," he said, angrily. The shepherd, equally angry, seized the animal by the neck, and as he dragged him down the aisle, sent back the growling retort at the pulpit, "It was yersel' begond it!"—London Freethinker.

THE late Catholic bishop of Raphoe used often to tell this story with enjoyment: "I was suddenly called," he said, "from my home to see an unfortunate sailor who had been cast ashore from a wreck, and was lying speechless upon the ground, but not quite dead. 'The life's in him still, your reverence; he stirred a little.' So I stooped down, and said to him: 'My poor man, you're nearly gone; but just try to say one little word, or make one little sign to show that you are dying in the true faith.' So he opened one of his eyes just a wee bit, and he said: 'Bloody end to the pope!' and so he died."—Argonaut.

TEMPTATION OF NICODEMUS.

My name is Nicodemus, an' the white folks call me John.
I'm a worker in the vinyard of the Lawd;
I work also at whitewashin' or anything that's on,
But life fur us pore cullahed folks at times is very hard.

I was bohn in ole Kentucky, an' was raised upon a farm;
I was always kind to turkeys, chickens, ducks, an' even goats;
I've hatched out gobs o' gobblers, and they fattened like a charm;
I'm very fond o' possum, sweet potatoes, an' roast shoats.

I wus gwine home from preachin', an' the night was monstus thick,
Fur ye can't scoop in the sinnahs widout work,
W'en I heard a somethin' seemin' to be callin' fur me quick,
An' ye know John Nicodemus ain't a cullahed man to shirk.

I fetched up nigh a tree wid de turkeys on its limb,
W'en one big gobbler tumbled off an' fell down at my feet;
Thinks I, the devil's temptin' me, an' I looked aroun' fur him.
Too dark to see the devil—gobbler fat an' fit to eat.

So I picked up that big turkey an' I put him in the tree.
Mr. Devil, ye can't tempt me, says I, I ain't sech a goose;
An' then, jess as a sort o' remuneration fee,
I borrowed a small turkey hen—the hen wuz layin' loose.

Didn't ole King Davy cut up bad about Uriah's wife;
Didn't Peter lie an' cuss until the rooster fetched him to?
Didn't pore ole Noah git so drunk he stripped off—oh, all life
Is full o' sech temptations laid out fur me an' you.

Now I am willin' jess to pony up an' pay for that ar hen,
An' I'm willin' to forgiv the pore sinnah, the accuser;
We will drop the subjec' now; let's hereaftah all be men,
If the devil evah tempts us we'll confess an' pay the loser.

Gems of Thought.

No people are free who sell in bundles their liberties to speculators in party spoils. —Galveston News.

If you can't pay for a thing, don't buy it. If you can't get paid for it, don't sell it. So you will hav calm days, drowsy nights, all the good business you hav now, and none of the bad.—Ruskin.

In respect to the knowing-faculties, we may confidently trust in the general law, that under normal conditions, healthful action is pleasurable, while action which givs pain is not healthful. —Herbert Spencer.

The dreariness of drudgery may be changed to the blessedness of drudgery, if the daily duty be regarded as the college of life for growth in mental power, and as a gymnasium for building up character.—Chicago Interior.

There are times when the inhumanity of a system stands out so red and foul, when the burden of iniquity weighs so heavily, and the contagion of its hypocrisy is so laden with mortal plague, that no awe of dilettante condemnation nor minute scruple as to the historic or the relativ can stay the hand of a man whose direct sight and moral energy hav pierced the veil of use and revealed the shrine of the infamous thing.—John Morley.

Bishop Thompson of Mississippi is no doubt right when he says that the religion of the plantation negro has not much to do with morals. But when he adds that "he dodges behind his Jesus to escape the consequences of his crimes, and, when he is hanged, he always goes to heaven," he is arraigning the religion of the whites as well as of the blacks. The negro did not invent this theological fiction; he was taught it —Christian Register.

There is nothing to make us wild with enthusiasm, but much to make us cheerful with hope. Our principles are spreading, our program is being gradually adopted by others, the very churches are being permeated by our heresy. The Christian superstition is melting away. Theological salvation is being supplanted by social salvation. It is our duty to hasten this beneficent process, and at the same time to uphold the principle of universal humanity, so that the happier future may not lose the inspiration of a great ideal.—G. W. Foote.

Enthusiasm givs life color. It enriches what it touches. Belief and enthusiasm fellow each other. Boreal and tropic, thev make the perfect sphere. Colorless professors, whose scholarship is an attenuation of non-committalism, add little or nothing to the great flush of life that throbs at the world-heart. Nothing more horribly travesties the great phenomena of conviction—the dreams of justice and the prophecies of seers—than the nimble and jaunty manner of professional parade, which touches surfaces at all points, but would not delve into the soil and indulge a passion lest it should soil its flesh and lose caste for parlors and fopperies.—Horace L. Traubel.

It is becoming, if it has not become, impossible for men of clear intellect and adequate instruction to believe, and it has ceased, or is ceasing, to be possible for such men honestly to say they believe, that the universe came into being in the fashion described in the first chapter of Genesis; or to accept, as a literal truth, the story of the making of woman. with the account of the catastrophe which followed hard upon it, in the second chapter; or to admit that the earth was repeopled with terrestrial inhabitants by immigration from Armenia or Kurdistan, little more than four thousand years ago, which is implied in the eighth chapter; or, finally, to shape their conduct in accordance with the conviction that the world is haunted by innumerable demons, who take possession of men, and may be driven out of them by exorcistic adjurations, which pervades the gospels.—Professor Huxley.

But as the intelligence in any race of people is increased, their religious fervor has grown more timid and parsimonious. Prayer and genuflexions hav gradually replaced the burdensome peace-offerings and the bloody sacrifices. Sometimes, as in China, offerings are made only in effigy; paper images are substituted for the real objects, and are burned in their place. The primitiv man, urged by some need or by some emotion, prays coarsely but sincerely. "Come and pray," a missionary said to an islander in Madagascar. "Pray for what? I am not in want of anything now," was the answer. After a while prayer becomes a formula read mechanically at stated times; rites and ceremonies are performed without warmth, without earnestness—simply from habit. This change seems to indicate that the age of faith will giv way to the age of examination, that the age of ignorance will hav to yield to the age of knowledge.—Dr. Chas. Letourneau.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A nineteenth Century Novel.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The autnor is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. THE HOLY CROSS SERIES.

The Popes and Their Doings. Biographical sketches of the most noted of these vicars of Christ and vicegerents of God, showing what they have done, and what kind of men they were. It contains very plain statements, in very unvarnished language, and the unmasking is complete, proving them to have been cruel, intriguing, and licentious men. Considering the rapid growth of Catholicism in this country, this book cannot be too widely disseminated. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Awful Disclosures of Maria Monk, as exhibited in a narrative of her sufferings during her residence of five years as a novice, and two years as a black nun, in the Hotel Dieu Nunnery, at Montreal. Perhaps not any anti-Catholic book published has created more excitement, and had such a circulation as this work. To counteract its effects the Catholics circulated a story that Maria Monk was "no better than she should be," but investigation disclosed that her "child of shame" was none other than the child of her priest-seducer. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth 75 cents.

Auricular Confession and Popish Nunneries. By Wm. Hogan, for twenty-five years a confessing priest. A revelation of the licentious practices of the priests and nuns in these religious brothels. There is no question that Ex-priest Hogan knew the truth of the tales of vice, seduction, and infanticide he gives in this volume, and equally there is no question that if the people generally knew of them, Catholicism would not be given the vast amounts of money now allowed it by our various city governments. Price, paper, 50 cents, cloth, 75 cents.

The Priest in Absolution. A Review of the system of auricular confession, including copious extracts from the "Confessional Unmasked," from the "Master Key to Popery," etc. The work is a protest against and an appeal to every American citizen to examine carefully and thoughtfully a religious system so invasive of privacy, so powerful for evil in licentious hands, so fraught with danger to female modesty, to the ingenuous openness of youth, and to the freedom of thought, speech, and action. Price, paper, 25 cents.

Priestly Celibacy Exposed. A lecture by the Rev. Geo. Townsend Fox, of Durham, England. Revised American edition, showing the result in parishes of the Roman decree that priests shall not marry. Price, paper, 15 cents.

CONWAY'S EDITION
OF
THE WRITINGS OF THOMAS PAINE.

COLLECTED, EDITED, AND CHRONOLOGICALLY ARRANGED

By MONCURE DANIEL CONWAY.

Author of "The Life of Thomas Paine," "Omitted Chapters of History Disclosed in the Life and Papers of Edmund Randolph," etc.

Four Volumes, Royal Octavo, Gilt Tops, Uniform with the Editor's "Life of Paine." Price per Volume, $2.50.

An edition of one hundred and fifty numbered copies bound in half leather, gilt tops, uniform with the limited editions of "The Writings of Washington," "The Writings of Jefferson," etc. Price, per volume, $4.

For the general reader the $3 edition of Paine's works is sufficient, as it contains all of his writings upon which his fame substantially rests. But for those who desire to go deeper into the subject of the man and polemic we can most unreservedly commend the "Life of Paine" by Mr Conway, and this edition of Paine's works edited by him It is the fullest that we are likely to have, and the student of history, and particularly the writer, should have it upon his shelves.

The work will consist of four volumes, and will be arranged chronologically. The cause of America, as Paine said, made him an author, and the first volume will cover the period of the American Revolution, beginning with the year 1774. It will therefore open with Paine's anti-slavery essay, and his philosophical or moral essays, while editing the Pennsylvania Magazine; these being followed by the great revolutionary, political, and controversial pamphlets which made such a profound impression on the country.

The second volume will consist mainly of the "Rights of Man," and pamphlets relating to English politics, but will also contain certain papers on French affairs.

The third and fourth volumes will consist mainly of Paine's religious writings, but will also contain some essays relating to American affairs, written in his last years. At the close will be given Paine's poems.

The first volume is now ready for delivery, and the others will follow soon. Orders for the whole set will be taken and filled as the volumes appear, or the volumes can be purchased separately. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER CO., 28 Lafayette Place, New York.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A Journal of Freethought and Reform.

Vol. 21. No. 28. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY.} New York, Saturday, July 14, 1894. {28 LAFAYETTE PL.} $3.00 Per Year.

THE WEIGHT OF SUPERSTITION—HISTORICAL OBJECT LESSON.

A Missionary Scheme.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has recently been doing, with the generous aid of its friends, a great deal of political missionary work. We hav given away thousands of the "Church Property" pamphlet, and it is doing its work, in this state particularly. We hav also given away thousands of arguments against the proposed national Sunday laws. Besides these, more thousands of TRUTH SEEKERS hav been scattered broadcast over the land.

With the advent of hot weather the political bodies will soon adjourn, but the people of the country will remain in session right along. And they are of not less importance than the politicians, and we want to devote a little attention to them.

Probably no one book has made more converts to common sense and won more people away from superstition than Paine's "Age of Reason." It is a book, as Colonel Ingersoll says, that furnishes an immense amount of food for thought. It is written for the average mind, and is a straightforward, honest investigation of the Bible and of the Christian system. It has liberalized us all. It puts arguments in the mouths of the people; it puts the church on the defensiv; it enables somebody in every village to corner the parson. It has never been "answered" and never can be.

What ought to be done, and what we propose to do, is to scatter this book broadcast—to giv and to hav given away thousands of them among the people. Every church-member that any Freethinker knows ought to hav one. It will do that church-member good, even if his wife burns it. He will read a few pages in it at least before she gets hold of it. But perhaps she too will read it. That book in a family is bound to do good—an immense amount. It has liberalized thousands and will liberalize thousands more. That book started THE TRUTH SEEKER, for from reading it D. M. Bennett, whom we all loved when living, and whose memory we now honor, became a Liberal. Previously he was a rigid churchman. There are more like him in the country, and it is they we ought to reach.

Our proposition is for every reader of this paper to send us the names and addresses of EIGHT of his Christian acquaintances and ONE DOLLAR, and we will mail each of them a copy of Paine's "AGE OF REASON."

If you don't know eight Christians you care enough about to convert, name those whom you do want to convert, send the dollar, and we will mail the remainder to some editor or public man or preacher worth saving.

In this way public opinion can be made and the church undermined. A few Freethinkers in a community can club together and convert a whole congregation, leaving the minister high and dry in his pulpit. Or they can send us the funds and we will make the selection of the target and take the responsibility of the work. What we want is to scatter the book among the people and hav it read.

Remember, we do all the work—all we ask is the names and addresses and means to mail the book. Surely everybody can help in this and make thousands of Freethinkers. Don't select the names of indifferentists, but those of good church people, with a preference for those who hav the capacity to think if they only are steered in the right direction.

We can still supply THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 9th, containing the copyrighted addresses of Colonel Ingersoll, T. B. Wakeman, and Henry Rowley, and others delivered at the Paine Memorial celebration at New Rochelle, May 30th. This is a finely illustrated number, and those who send for it at once will be the recipients of a charming souvenir. Seven cents per copy, five or more copies, five cents each.

A twelve-page protest against the Sunday bills offered in Congress by Kyle, Johnson, Gallinger, and Morse will be sent for five cents. Twenty-five copies, three cents each; one hundred copies, $2.

Of all the tramps who liv on others' labors,
  Beware of scamps who unctuously gabble
Of wings and crowns and harps and howling neighbors
  In other worlds (in distant clouds of bliss
Or somewhere else), and just that they may gobble,
  Sans work or cash, the best of things in this.

Ministers in the Army and Navy.

Why should the United States government pay $50,000 or more each year for the services of chaplains in the army? What legitimate claim hav they, as clergymen, upon the treasury? Is it any part of the duty of a civil government to buy prayers for its employees? Is the official support of chaplains by any possibility reconcilable with the theory of the total separation of church and state? Does not state payment of chaplains form one strand in the many-fold cord which binds together the two?

Rene Bache, a well-known syndicate newspaper writer, has lately given the reading public some statistical and other information about this great abuse. Stationed at posts in various parts of the country are thirty-four clergymen on the pay-rolls of the nation. Four of these are regimental chaplains attached to the four regiments of negro troops. One of these four is a white man. The pay of a chaplain when first commissioned is $1,350 per year, and ten per cent is added for each five years of service. His rank is always that of a captain. When retired, he receives three-fourths pay. No age limit restricts the appointment of chaplains. A man may be appointed when sixty-three years and eleven months old, and retire a month later with the rank and pay of a captain. A chaplain has a much softer berth than a line officer, as he does not hav to wait for years for slow promotion from the lowest commissioned grade. He is entitled to good quarters at government expense. He may hav five rooms.

There is eager competition for these places. Clergymen in large numbers are always anxious to be appointed, some of them giving up rich parishes in order to accept. Favor alone governs in making appointments. No attention is paid to the religious preferences of the officers and men. Of the chaplains now in commission in the army seven are Baptists, nine are Episcopalians, eleven are Methodists, two are Presbyterians, one each is a Christian, Lutheran, and Congregationalist, and two are Catholics.

The chaplain attends to the religious duties at the post and also makes a record of all baptisms, marriages, and deaths at which he officiates. He oversees the instruction of the enlisted men and of children. Suppose a man is appointed at the age of twenty-five; if he remains in the service until he reaches the retiring age, he will be drawing $2,295 per year at that time, and will thereafter receive until his death $1,721.25 each year.

As in the army, so in the navy, the position of the chaplain is a sinecure, is also held for life, but is a much better financial investment. For the first five years the navy chaplain gets $2,500 per year when on ship duty, $2,000 on shore duty, and $1,900 when on leave. After five years the pay is $2,800 when at sea, $2,300 on shore duty, and $1,900 on leave. After retirement, he receives three-fourths of the sea pay of $2,800 per year. At the present time twenty followers of the "peaceful" Nazarene hold these very desirable places. The four oldest in the service hav relativ rank as captains, the next seven are ranked as commanders, the next seven as lieutenant-commanders or lieutenants, and the others are without rank. There is an age limit for appointments of chaplains in the navy—thirty-five years.

The naval chaplain's duties are very light, and when on shore duty often nothing. On board ship he conducts such religious services as the captain orders. He may form Sunday-school classes, with the captain's permission. He must not intrude his religious instruction where it is not desired, but can do all the private missionary work he pleases. He must visit the sick frequently. He is a teacher, also, when the sailors desire it.

There can be no question that the appointment of ministers only as chaplains is unconstitutional. Section 3 of Article VI. declares that "No religious test shall be required as a qualification to any office of public trust under the United States." As only ministers in good standing in some denomination can be appointed to chaplaincies, it is perfectly clear that every chaplain in the army and navy is illegally in office. He is there because a test which the Constitution forbids has been imposed upon all candidates. This crux is fatal to all aspirants save clergymen.

There has been some improvement as regards religious services during the last thirty-five years. In the days before the war it was not unusual for commanders of forts to compel non-church-attending soldiers to listen for an hour or more every Sunday to the reading of the regulations and articles of war. This was meant as a punishment and has been abandoned. Admiral Godon had a habit of forcing sailors who did not attend religious exercises to toe a plank for a specified time. The next step forward should be the abolition of all chaplaincies, as the Liberal League demanded from the first moment of its organization. It should need no argument to convince any fair-minded and intelligent person that the government has no right whatever to appropriate public money for the inculcation of religious dogmas in the army and navy, in Congress or elsewhere. The whole thing is a survival from the days when church and state were united. Away with the abomination!

Still Maundering of "Divine Rule."

Commenting upon the assassination of President Carnot, the Christian Reformer pitches savagely into its "dearest foe," secular government. Here is a sample paragraph:

"We hav no hesitation in saying that the chief cause of Anarchy is secularism in civil government. The nations of the earth set up governments but not by God. They establish laws and ordinances regardless of, and sometimes in opposition to, the divine law. Civil governments do not appeal to the consciences of their citizens, and call upon them to obey the law in the name of God. Even laws that are good are enforced, not because they are the voice of God, but solely because they are the will of the people. There is no partnership between God and civil government to-day, and, as a consequence, we hav reared a generation who fear neither God nor government."

Is it true that there is no union of the religious and civil in government to-day? The president of France was assassinated, and France officially pays annually a vast sum for the support of religion. There are many Freethinkers in France, but France is not yet a secular republic. The "partnership between God and civil government" remains, for "God" can form a partnership with government at second-hand only, the priests being his proxies. Alexander of Russia died by the bomb of the assassin, and in Russia church and state are one. The partnership aforesaid is complete. What the Christian Reformer means is, of course, perfectly clear. It means that there is no avowed partnership between the Covenanters and civil government. Partnership with Catholic or Greek Christians or non-Presbyterian Protestants is no defense against the lightnings of divine wrath. Of course there were no riots, no assassinations of rulers, no revolutions in the ages of faith when all believed that kings, as kings, received their credentials directly from the bureau of God's prime minister, signed by the hand of the Supreme. The Reformer is under the necessity of ignoring all history and all current events but such as by the most strained and fanciful interpretation can be forced to adorn its lugubrious tale.

The theocratic organ makes all it can of the fact that Carnot was murdered on Sunday while on his way to the theater, after attending a banquet in his honor. He had also gone to Lyons to visit an exposition which was open on Sunday. Could anything be plainer? And no doubt Lincoln was killed by God, through the instrumentality of Booth, because he had ventured into a theater. He was slaughtered in the act, on the scene of his horrible crime! The Christian Reformer sticks remorselessly to its text, concluding its jeremiad in these words:

"Is there not a close connection between such an open disregard of the law of the Sabbath, such a public insult to the government of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the development of the spirit of Anarchy? If civil government refuses to acknowledge divine authority and law, if civil magistrates publicly trample upon divine commands, we may expect to produce a race of Anarchists who fear neither divine nor human government. What, then, is the remedy? Banish the whole secular idea from political life. Let religion hav its proper place in the public schools, and in all national institutions. Let laws be enacted and enforced avowedly in the name and by the authority of Almighty God and the mediatorial ruler, the Lord Jesus Christ. Let the constitutions of civil government be framed in accordance with the revealed principles of government. Then and only then will the nations be free from the danger of Anarchy and experience the blessedness of the nation whose God is the Lord."

There you hav the program of the theocrats without the slightest attempt to qualify their demands. Church and state are to be one and that one the church. This scheme enables them to say with apparent respect for the truth that they are opposed to the union of state and church. They are. It is not union of two equal powers that they wish, but the fusing of them into an indivisible oneness, the state being absorbed by and into the church and the resulting theocracy taking the place of both the secular civil state and of the churches, the latter hitherto depending largely upon their own resources, but hereafter to be sustained by the political arm of the new amalgamated church.

Another Drag-Net Law to Fight.

On May 29th Senator Vilas, of Wisconsin, introduced (by request) the following bill, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads:

"A bill to prevent the carrying of obscene literature and articles designed for indecent and immoral use from one state or territory into another state or territory.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representativs of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be unlawful for any person to deposit with any express company or other common carrier for carriage from one state or territory of the United States or the District of Columbia to any other state or territory of the United States or the District of Columbia any obscene, lewd, or lascivious book, pamphlet, picture, paper, letter, writing, print, or other matter of an indecent character, or any article or thing designed or intended for the prevention of conception or procuring of abortion, or any article or thing intended or adapted for any indecent or immoral use, or any written or printed card, letter, circular, book, pamphlet, advertisment, or notice of any kind giving information, directly or indirectly, where, how, or of whom, or by what means any of the hereinbefore mentioned articles, matters, or things may be obtained or made, and any person who shall knowingly deposit, or cause to be deposited, with any express company or other common carrier for carriage from one state or territory of the United States or the District of Columbia to any other state or territory of the United States or the District of Columbia, or who shall take from such express company or other common carrier with intent to sell, distribute, or circulate any matter or thing herein forbidden to be deposited for carriage, shall for each offense, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than five thousand dollars or imprisoned at hard labor not more than five years, or both, at the discretion of the court."

The Letter-Writing Corps has now an opportunity to do some more timely work. It is stated that this bill has already passed the Senate and hence the point to be attacked is the House of Representativs. Write to your own Representativ at once. There is no time to lose. Not only should the regular writers of the Corps protest against this dangerous measure, but all our readers should appeal to their Representativs to work and vote against it. There is no need for such a statute. Congress has no business with this matter. Other agencies are amply competent to do all that needs to be done in the premises. We hav already had altogether too much meddling with private affairs. That word "indecent" givs the whole scheme away. It is intended to take in all literature and art which may be offensiv to Christians. Who can doubt that many juries would pronounce THE TRUTH SEEKER cartoons "indecent"? And we well know the reception accorded by ignorant officials and jurors to works on physiology which are perfectly serious and pure, and educativ in the most helpful sense. Some of the best of books hav been attacked under similar laws. It is notorious that the people who interest themselvs in the enactment and enforcement of these laws are wholly incompetent as judges of literature, art, physiology, or morals. They are medieval, narrow, bigoted, intolerant anti-naturalists. Their ideas are archaic. They see indecency in everything that is new to them or opposed to the primitiv delusions they cherish. How lop-sided they are is shown by the fact that, while they are eager to suppress the world's greatest "profane" classics, and hate physiology and heresy with a bitter, unreasoning hatred, they base all their theories upon a book which contains an immense amount of what, should they find it in any other volume, they would call "indecency" and "obscenity," and they glory in the fact that millions of copies of this Bible are every year sent to all parts of the world by mail and express and as freight. Are they dishonest or merely ignorant? In either case, should we help them write their antediluvian notions in the statute books of the nation that better, more intelligent men and women may be robbed and tortured and "the movement in favor of ignorance" spread like a blight over the whole land?

The penalties attached to these contemptible statutes are out of all proportion to the offense, when a real offense is committed. Many crimes of violence, and betrayals of trust, are punished far more lightly: A man who wrecks a bank and plunges hundreds or thousands of families into ruin gets off with a few years of imprisonment and pays back not a cent to those whose confidence he has foully betrayed and whose future he has filled with doubt, despair, and want. This Vilas bill is infamous from every point of view.

How far we are behind England and her colonies is shown by our hypocritical statutes intended to prevent the sensible limitation of population. In England and Australasia all such books and works are openly advertised and sold. They are transmitted by all the carriers of a civilized society. The man who drafted this bill, the Senator who introduced it, and those who voted for it, know very well that in most of the intelligent families in this country to-day some contraceptic device is resorted to to prevent an undue increase of the number of children. There can be no doubt that men who voted for the Vilas bill hav used their knowlege of physiology to limit the number of their own offspring. And yet they would send a physician to prison for five years and break up his business for giving some other husband or some wife the information or means which they gladly obtained from some doctor, publisher, or manufacturer, and freely used. These law-makers know or should know that fœticide is the child of just such repressiv statutes as this now pending in Congress. The choice lies between prevention of conception and abortion, practically, all theories to the contrary notwithstanding. The classes who more that all others fill our foundling asylums, orphanages, poor houses, and prisons to overflowing are the classes who recklessly obey the Biblical command to "increase and multiply." They hav not sense enough to prevent the advent of children they can neither feed, clothe, educate, nor endow with physical and moral health. It is time the truth were told. If the government had properly anything to do with this business it should send teachers fully equipped with knowledge and the means for applying that knowledge among the people, instructing them in the science and art of bringing "fewer and better babies" into the world. But as it has not, it should take its hands off and giv all instructors the fullest opportunity to teach and uplift the masses. To punish anyone for giving the information necessary to enable women to forego the production of children they hav reason to believe would not be desired or which would lack the necessary mental, physical, and moral vigor is a crime against the race than which there can be none greater. The Vilas bill would inflict such punishment. Kill it.

Our Missionary Offer.

We are glad that our readers are so enthusiastically taking hold to help us put the "Age of Reason" into the hands of orthodox people. The responses to our great offer in last week's paper are already very gratifying and encouraging. The first to get his answer to our desk is E. S. Todd, of Marion, Connecticut, who sends his dollar and the eight addresses. Next comes our earnest young worker, Llewellyn D. Crine, of this city. Here is an excerpt from the letter which brought his two dollars for sixteen "Age of Reasons":

"The proposition of THE TRUTH SEEKER to distribute the 'Age of Reason' ranks among the most practical working ideas of that paper, and merits to meet with hearty response. Some Freethinker who has been out of darkness for forty years and achieved business success ought to contribute $1,000 to assist in carrying out THE TRUTH SEEKER's plan. The contributions to the church nowadays are either in the form of coppers or of $10,000 checks. There ought to be one prosperous Infidel in America willing to contribute $1,000 to encourage and assist this paper in prosecuting its noble undertakings. It is worth millions of dollars annually to business to hav the people educated to recognize a philosophical fact when they see it, and when the business men of the country understand that Infidelity means absolute truth, peace, and commercial prosperity, then there will be plenty of successful business men to contribute freely to the support of such a mental emancipator as THE TRUTH SEEKER. We want this to be a common sense land and not a Christian land."

These will be sufficient this time to show the Freethinkers of the country the spirit in which our offer is received. See the proposition on front page. We meet so many people who say, "'The Age of Reason'? Yes, that's what started me." We can easily multiply these by ten in the next five years if we all take hold and pull together. Giv Paine's great masterpiece of theological criticism a boom. It will always defend and justify itself and our praises of it. Why cannot every reading Christian in your neighborhood hav a copy?

Is the Bible Obscene?

J. B. Wise, of Clay Center, Kansas, was, when last heard from (Monday of this week), in the jail at Leavenworth, where he was held as a United States prisoner for lack of a bondsman who could qualify in the sum of $300. Mr. Wise was indicted by a federal grand jury for having sent through the mails to a preacher, with whom he had been carrying on an epistolary discussion on religious subjects, a postal card on which was written a verbatim quotation of a verse from the Bible. The preacher, Rev. Mr. Vennum, of Industry, Kansas, was a coward to set upon an old man, a cripple, the sleuth-hounds and bulldogs of the national government because that cripple had called his attention to a passage in his (Vennum's) paper and ink fetich. We do not at this moment recall a meaner performance in all the annals of roguery.

If the national government is going to prevent the circulation of obscene and indecent literature, it must be fair and impartial in the enforcement of the law. If the Bible is obscene and indecent, then it should be denied the right of circulation, if any publication is. If the Bible is not obscene and indecent, then no publication is properly within the purview of existing and contemplated legislation.

In a private note J. E. Remsburg writes:

"I am in receipt of a letter from your correspondent and agent, J. B. Wise. He is now in jail at Leavenworth, Kan. He had a controversy with a puny bigot, Rev. H. B. Vennum, of Industry, Kan. In one of his letters to Vennum Mr Wise quoted a passage from the Bible for which Vennum has had him arrested on the charge of sending obscene matter through the mails. A United States court will either hav to acquit Mr. Wise or declare the Bible obscene. Mr. Wise is a fearless Liberal, an honest, worthy man, carries an armless sleeve, and deserves the moral and financial support of every Liberal in the land."

Mr. Wise must hav a prompt and fair trial. We must know just what position a man occupies under the obscenity statute who mails the Bible or extracts therefrom. The time and opportunity hav come to hav this matter thoroughly tested. As the first step, Mr. Wise is to be released from jail. Bail must be furnished. Drs. E. B. Foote, Sr. and Jr., and the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER hav written to John E. Remsburg to bail out Mr. Wise, they guaranteeing Mr. Remsburg against any possible loss. An attorney has been retained and all the powers of the Defense Association and of THE TRUTH SEEKER will be exerted in behalf of the veteran Freethinker who has dared to send through the mails to one of its accredited expounders a passage from God's infallible word. Rev. Mr. Vennum has, by causing the arrest of J. B. Wise, charged the Bible with being obscene. If the courts agree with him we do not see how honest Christians, who sincerely believe in the suppression of obscene literature and hold the decisions of law tribunals to be final as regards the transmissibility of a book, can longer consent to the publication, circulation and use in homes, schools, and churches of the unexpurgated edition of the scriptures. It is our laudable desire to induce Christians to frankly face this issue.

The township committees of several New Jersey villages are bidding for notoriety by the issuance of ukases against Sunday work and sport. In Milburn one Donata Russo, a fruit dealer, was arrested four times in one day for disregarding the edict of the rural czars. It will readily be admitted by all except men and women of good sense that it is a horrible crime to exchange apples, bananas, cherries, and other fruits for small coins. That is, it is a crime on Sunday; on other days it is a meritorious act. The cause of the difference always readily suggests itself to the self-interest of the priest.

Among the many peculiar "dispensations of divine providence" which hav lately arrested the attention of thoughtful people and some Christians was the drowning of sixteen-year-old Gardner Wright at Asbury Park, New Jersey. In his pocket was found a Testament, which he read morning and evening, and his younger brother, who was with him when he met his sad death, said that the unfortunate but pious boy had read in it a few minutes before he went in bathing. We do not understand this. Had he been a wicked lad, who went swimming on Sunday, the whole matter would be perfectly plain.

Mrs. Amanda Murray, wife of our able and activ co-worker, Mr. B. C. Murray, editor of the Sunday Gazetteer, Denison, Texas, has laid down the burdens and surrendered the joys of life, yielding to the silent but resistless attacks of consumption. Mrs. Murray was a woman of intelligence, wide and deep sympathies, great love for children, and she took intense delight in the observation and study of nature. She was in hearty agreement with Mr. Murray in his work for freedom and justice. May his philosophy of life sustain him in the hours of loss and grief and loneliness that are now his. Separation and deprivation sooner or later come to us all. We are in the universe, and it is vain to hope to escape its processes. We are born, we endure, we love, we work, we sleep. Before us, with us, after us, others. Life and death play ceaseless shuttles and together weave an endless web of existence.

The Voice has just been made happy. It found this in an exchange and greedily quoted it:

"'Did you ever see a counterfeit bank-note?' 'Yes.' 'Why was it counterfeited?' 'Because the genuin note was worth counterfeiting.' 'Did you ever see a scrap of brown paper counterfeited?' 'No.' 'Why not?' 'Because it was not worth counterfeiting.' 'Did you ever see a counterfeit Christian?' 'Yes.' 'Why was he counterfeited?' 'Because he was worth counterfeiting.' 'Was he to blame for the counterfeit?' 'Of course not.' 'Did you ever see a counterfeit Infidel?' 'Why, no.' 'Why not?'"

"Why do men pretend to be Christians?" "Because they expect to derive some advantage from the deception." "Under what conditions do they make these false pretenses?" "When the popular sentiment of the assemblage, the neighborhood, or the field of their political ambition is Christian." "Would they pretend to be Christians where there was nothing to be gained by the false profession, in a Mohammedan country, for instance?" "No." "What would they pretend to be there?" "Mohammedans, of course." "Then we are to infer, doubtless, that Mohammedanism is worth counterfeiting?" "N— ye—well, er— er—I, er— I never looked at the argument quite in that way before." "So we thought."

These are parlous times for the Liberal missionary There is no surety that he can meet his engagements, and if he does he runs the risk of seeing a good portion of his audience trail out if he tells fundamental truths, as he must. Then he has to buffet the dead waters of indifference in many places. It is a fact that there are tens of thousands of men who, in an indefinit, inchoate way are Freethinkers, who cannot be induced to inform themselvs as to the situation and the dangers that threaten and assail. They do not know anything about our lecturers and the encroachments of the church party. In fact, they are not in touch with the times. And all this ignorance is due to the fact that they do not read the Freethought papers. Mr. Putnam this week lets in the light upon some of these dark corners and phases. See "Notes and News." Cheer him up by sending $6.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," or $5 for the book alone. There is still time to get in your name. The question of the taxation of church property should be kept before the New York Constitutional Convention in every possible way. We cannot afford to let this opportunity to establish equity in taxation be fruitless through the neglect of our share of the work. The New York section of the Freethought Letter-Writing Corps will, as usual, write to members of the committees likely to consider this subject. Write each week to those not previously addressed by you. Here is a full list of the committeemen:

The case of C. C. Moore, editor of the Blue Grass Blade, who was indicted for "blasphemy" and "nuisance," as THE TRUTH SEEKER informed its readers at the time, came up on demurrer in the circuit court at Lexington, Kentucky, on July 2d. Nearly the whole session of the court that afternoon was consumed in the argument of a general demurrer, Bronson & Allen appearing for the commonwealth and Judges Denny and Morton for Mr. Moore. At the conclusion of the argument Judge Parker took the matter under advisement and it will probably be several days before his decision is handed down. Rev. E. L. Southgate, the prosecuting witness, said to a reporter of the Lexington Transcript:

"I hav no idea what Judge Parker's decision will be, but I know that he will do what he thinks is proper and according to the law. I don't want to see Charlie Moore go to jail or hav to spend any money on this thing, but I do want to see that paper suppressed, because it is a nuisance of the veriest nature."

Mr. Southgate is very shortsighted, a weakness which is common to the supervisors and suppressors of literature. There can be no doubt that he is the best advertising agent and canvasser that C. C. Moore has in his employ. Thousands who had never before even heard of the Blue Grass Blade hav been made acquainted with it during the past three months, and all through the offensiv bigotry and pernicious activity of Rev. Mr. Southgate. All American citizens are vitally interested—although but few of them realize the fact—in the maintenance of the freedom of the press, and they would be distinct losers should this Kentucky minister succeed in his crusade against the Blade, and this solely because the guarantees of free speech would be weakened by such a victory for the reactionist. We sincerely hope that, whatever the decision of Judge Parker, Rev. Mr. Southgate will quit this foolish business of advertising solicitor for Mr. Moore. He has made some very serious mistakes.

Charles C. Moore is free, Judge Parker sustaining his general demurrer to the indictment. No other outcome seemed possible under the Kentucky constitution. It is a substantial victory over bigotry, and we hope that the paper selected for suppression will hereafter justify the wisdom of the framers of the Kentucky law. The attorneys for the state gave notice of appeal, which was granted.

Our Covenanter and Catholic friends seem to be in substantial agreement as to the cause which led to the murder of President Carnot. We hav already quoted some of the utterances of the Christian Reformer anent the matter, and now we find this in the Catholic Review:

"The trouble begins when the poor and the unfortunate hav lost their belief in God. To them the 'compact,' and all the restraints of law and inequality of circumstances that rest upon it, are but an odious tyranny. In other words, the growth and spread of Anarchistic ideas are but the logical outcome of the denial of God, and of the duty of allegiance to established government as having the sanction of God."

There can be no doubt that implicit belief in "providence" is the most potent factor in reconciling the millions to their hard conditions and in maintaining despotic governments. But the lines of impulse, purpose, and achievement cross and recross until they are inextricably entangled and until the spirit of revenge, born of centuries of superstition, ignorance, and suppression, arms the hands of fanatics, both within and without the pale of religion, and all alike uninformed as to the true methods of progress, with dagger and bomb and torch, and mad deeds are done which retard immeasurably the march of the people. Yet, deplorable as is this theoretical and practical survival of belief in violence as a remedy for bad social conditions, it has not produced anything which, for bloodiness, cruelty, and deathliness, can for a moment be compared with the awful evils which cursed poor, blind humanity in the fearful ages when abject belief in God and the divinity of government made of the Christian countries vast slaughter houses and torture chambers. Science and Atheism hav won something for the race, so much, indeed, that he must be either hopelessly stupid or aflame with the lust of cruel ambition, who would prefer to hav lived in the "ages of faith" rather than in this era of partial enlightenment and semi-liberation from the gyves of priest and politician. The world has had greatly more than enough of government by God, and the Covenanter and Catholic are idly dreaming, we hope, if they imagin that it will tamely put its neck once more under the white-hot yoke of ecclesiasticism.

Stephen Girard.

BY J. C. HANNON.

[An address delivered before the Friendship Liberal League, Philadelphia, May 20, 1894.]

There is no name more frequently spoken in this city of Philadelphia than that of Girard. When we speak of Girard avenue or allude to the Girard estate we associate those terms with that peculiar and eccentric genius whose outer person, clothed in a rough and rugged exterior, concealed a noble and generous soul. He was not distinguished for his personal beauty, and would cut a very indifferent figure among Ward McAllister's Four Hundred, but in the growth of the city, the development of the state and nation and the commercial intercourse of the world, Stephen Girard has erected an enduring monument to his own industry, patriotism, and enterprise. His life has become an essential part of American history, and his name must shine in the firmament of American achievement while one stone of Girard College rests upon another. We can best discharge our obligation to him to-day by calling public attention to the fact that his will has been perverted by Jesuitical conspirators who, in defiance of the letter and spirit of his bequest, hav quietly appropriated his college and his bounty and prostituted them to the purposes of priestcraft, at the same time raising the silly and stupid cry of "What hav Infidels done for the world—what charity hav they fostered, what college hav they raised?" These questions are amusing by reason of their insolence, and saddening because of the reflection that Girard's magnificent college, established without priest or creed, is now a recognized theological institution, having a splendid church edifice surmounted by a cross, and being used for the very purpose he endeavored to avoid—namely, for the inculcation of religious tenets and the performance of religious ceremonies.

That this offense was long premeditated is conclusivly shown in the argument of Daniel Webster before the Supreme Court of the United States some fifty years ago. Listen to the great expounder of the Constitution! "As there can be no Sabbath observance in this college, I deny it to be a charity, for all charity is founded on the Christian religion. As this plan of education tends to weaken men's reverence, it leads to mischievous, not to useful, ends. If Mr. Girard had given years of study to a plan by which he could dispose of his vast wealth so that no good could arise to the general cause of learning, no good to the cause of charity, no good to human society in the present and future, and which should be productiv of protracted struggles in the popular councils of a great city, he could not hav more effectually accomplished his purpose. This Will is unblessed by God and despised by men; immoral in its intent and purpose, unwise in all its frame and theory. I therefore predict it will lead a short, annoyed, and troubled life, and leave an unblessed memory when it dies." This is the only instance in which Daniel Webster (whose own private views were liberal) ever betrayed his genius to an unholy cause and reaped the harvest of remorse, shame, and regret. But his efforts produced an effect the opposit of his intentions, and Girard College was established among the permanent landmarks of Philadelphia. The buzzards of superstition, however, were not dismayed by their defeat, and prepared to thwart Girard's benevolent design by a masterpiece of Jesuitical strategy. This is effected by the appointment for life of directors whose views are of a pronounced evangelical type, ignoring Quakers, Unitarians, Hebrews, Universalists, and Freethinkers. Since Constantine, in the fourth century, projected his pernicious scheme, it has been the habit of priests to grab everything in sight. Nothing was too great or too small, nothing too hot or too cold, sacred or profane, to be utilized in the propagation of the church's dogmas and perpetuate her scheme of territorial aggrandizement; hence it is only natural that this propensity finds increase of vigor when so large and important an object as Girard College is involved. It is not my province to say how it is done, but there stands the College church, and it speaks for itself. Girard is dead, and priestcraft, gloating over the plunder of helpless orphans, points to the church edifice erected by his money and sneeringly asks, "What hav Infidels done for the world—what charities hav they fostered, what colleges hav they raised?"

It is my province to answer these questions here and now; and a very appropriate time and place are Girard's adopted city and the one hundred and forty-fourth anniversary of his birth. Though benevolence is no test of the truth of any religion, it may be as well to state that Girard was a Roman Catholic by birth, an Atheist by conviction, and a humanitarian by nature. He left his superstition in the cradle, and fought the battles of his stormy life in the atmosphere of philosophy and truth. He rose above the vulgar and conventional errors of "the madding crowd," content to abide by the verdict of the future and the matured judgment of posterity. Conscious of his own faults, he had charity for the weaknesses of others. Like Thomas Paine, the world was his country; his actions stand as an index of his creed. He knew no distinction of men except those created by their own merits. He had no respect for pedigree, and pitied the person who had nothing to feel proud of but his ancestors. He had a natural distrust of priestcraft in every form. He punctured the inflated vanity of the clergy, and viewed their pretentious titles without the aid of a magnifying glass. He never catered to public prejudice; he looked all men squarely in the face, and though he demanded measure for measure his pursestring was never drawn when charity appealed or the afflicted needed a friend. His maxim was "Deeds, not creeds," and the services he rendered during the plague of yellow fever proved his consistency and distinguished him as the Good Samaritan par excellence of his century. When the clergy and their respectable congregations were fleeing by thousands from a plague-stricken city; when the fondest ties of friendship were disregarded; when fathers and mothers, sons and daughters, sisters and brothers, deserted their dead and dying in that awful extremity of self-preservation; when every sentiment of religion or mercy was forgotten; when the very fabric of society was rent and dissolved, Stephen Girard, Infidel, without hope of a heavenly reward, with no blessing of God like a June breeze upon his brow, with nought to stimulate his efforts save the exalted motivs of humanity, and at the risk of his own life, gave his counsel, his wealth, and his personal help as hospital nurse, regardless of color or condition of the sufferer. He furnished provisions and fuel for the poor; he provided burial for the dead; and this Infidel (incapable of being edified by the influences of the Christian religion) received under his personal care over two hundred orphan children. There are numerous accounts of his heroic conduct; the following is one of many well authenticated by eye-witnesses and published by Matthew Cary of this city:

A Mr. Thompson who, like many others, had removed his family from the city, found it imperativ to visit, on a matter of important business, a section known as Farmer's Row, situated near Second and York streets, where the fever was raging with extraordinary virulence. Having taken all the precautions for his own safety that medical science could suggest, he proceeded on his errand. There was nothing to break the silence of that awful and ghastly spot or to convey the idea that anything there was invested with life. Every vestige of business had departed, every door was closed. He felt that he had earned the name of a man of remarkable courage, as he stood motionless and gazed on the buildings containing the dead and the dying who had no soul at hand to moisten their lips or to witness the last agonies of life. His heart sank within him as he turned to retrace his steps, when suddenly he saw a yellow carriage, driven by a negro, stop in front of one of the frame buildings in the street. Mr. Thompson withdrew as far as possible for fear of contamination, but curiosity impelled him to keep the carriage in sight. The driver, having bound a camphorated handkerchief about his mouth, opened the door of the carriage, and then, with the utmost composure, resumed his seat. A short man in shirtsleeves stepped from the coach, entered the abode of wretchedness, and returned shortly afterward bringing with him a human being who had been left there alone to die. The sufferer was too large a man to admit of being carried, but the right arm of his conductor was thrown about him for support, while his feet dragged helplessly on the pavement. The yellow, cadaverous face of the one rested against the bronzed cheek of the other, while his every breath exhaled a volume of putrid and death-bearing effluvium. His hair, long and matted by neglect, added to the repulsivness of his appearance. In this manner the well man half dragged and partly carried the patient to his carriage, which he himself entered, and the vehicle rolled slowly away. As the strange party passed him Mr. Thompson saw the sick man lying helpless in the arms of his deliverer. The name of the rescued one he did not learn; but the man who risked his life for a fellow-mortal having no claim of consanguinity upon his service, he subsequently ascertained, was the Infidel philanthropist, Stephen Girard.

What a sublime sight! A man of genius and wealth devoting his life to the care of the sick, the wants of the poor! Talk not to me of the glory of your battlefields, where frenzied rage inspires the slave to die at his master's bidding. You may tell in story or in song of Spartan courage or Roman valor; you may paint in glowing colors on the canvass of imagination the vicarious atonement of Jesus, but what are these divested of the hopes of reward? They are small and contemptible in comparison with that sublime conflict of death and duty.

Girard's whole life shines with an effulgence born of trials and triumphs, any one of which would immortalize his name. Though he labored seven or eight hours every day in the hospital, Sundays included (leaving it only to care for the sick and bury the dead), he was a marvel of preservation, and had he remained true to the religion of his infancy he would now be canonized as a miracle of God's special providence. Had he founded a convent the Catholic world would point to him as the chosen instrument of God to spread his holy religion. His bones would be preserved as relics for the special cure of yellow fever. Had he named his ships "Immaculate Conception," "Blessed Trinity," etc., their successful voyages would be attributed to supernatural care. The priest would say:

> God sped his ships from coast to coast,
> Fanned by the wings of the Holy Ghost.

But Girard had no confidence in special providence; he relied more on good timber and skillful navigation. His ships were named respectivly in the order of their building "Voltaire," "Helvetius," "Montesquieu," and "Rousseau." These, with three others, formed the noteworthy part of that stanch commercial fleet which built up his magnificent fortune and won for him the title of the "Napoleon of commerce."

General Grant on Church and State.

General Grant will liv in history rather as a great soldier than as a great statesman. Yet there is much in his career as a statesman to admire, especially his attitude in regard to church and state. No president, with the possible exception of Jefferson, has occupied more advanced grounds or advocated more radical measures of reform in this respect.

Grant is the only president, I believe, who has in his official capacity contended for the taxation of church property. In his message to Congress in 1875 he made the following earnest plea for this just demand:

I would also call your attention to the importance of correcting an evil that, if permitted to continue, will probably lead to great trouble in our land before the close of the nineteenth century. It is the acquisition of vast amounts of untaxed church property. In 1850, I believe, the church property of the United States, which paid no tax, municipal or state, amounted to about $83,000,000. In 1860 the amount had doubled. In 1875 it is about $1,000,000,000. By 1900, without a check, it is safe to say this property will reach a sum exceeding $3,000,000,000. So vast a sum receiving all the protection and benefits of government, without bearing its proportion of the burdens and expenses of the same, will not be looked upon acquiescently by those who hav to pay the taxes. In a growing country where real estate enhances so rapidly with time as in the United States there is scarcely a limit to the wealth that may be acquired by corporations, religious or otherwise, if allowed to retain real estate without taxation. The contemplation of so vast a property as here alluded to, without taxation, may lead to sequestration without constitutional authority, and through blood. I would suggest the taxation of all property equally, whether church or corporation."

Equally radical and pronounced are his recommendations, in the same message, in favor of the complete secularization of our public schools.

We are a Republic whereof one man is as good as another before the law. Under such a form of government, it is of the greatest importance that all should be possessed of education and intelligence enough to cast a vote with a right understanding of its meaning. A large association of ignorant men cannot for any considerable period oppose a successful resistance to tyranny and oppression from the educated few, but will inevitably sink into acquiescence to the will of intelligence, whether directed by the demagog or by priestcraft. Hence the education of the masses becomes of the first necessity for the preservation of our institutions. They are worth preserving, because they hav secured the greatest good for the greatest proportion of the population of any form of government yet devised. All other forms of governments approach it just in proportion to the general diffusion of education and independence of thought and action. As the primary step, therefore, to our advancement in all that has marked our progress in the past century, I suggest for your earnest consideration, and most earnestly recommend it, that a constitutional amendment be submitted to the legislatures of the several states for ratification, making it the duty of the several states to establish and forever maintain free public schools adequate to the education of all the children in the rudimentary branches within their respectiv limits, irrespectiv of sex, color, birthplace, or religion, forbidding the teaching in said schools of religious, Atheistic or pagan tenets, and prohibiting the granting of any school funds or school taxes or any part thereof, either by legislativ, municipal, or other authority, for the benefit, or in aid, directly or indirectly, of any religious sect or denomination.

His speech before the army of the Tennessee, at Des Moines, in 1875, was one of the noblest, one of the bravest, and one of the most opportune utterances ever delivered in this country. In this speech he said:

The free school is the promoter of that intelligence which is to preserve us as a nation. If we are to hav another contest in the near future of our national existence. I predict that the dividing line will not be Mason's and Dixon's, but between patriotism and intelligence on the one side, and superstition, ambition, and ignorance on the other. · · · Let us all labor to add all needful guarantees for the more perfect security of free thought, free speech, and free press, pure morals, unfettered religious sentiments, and of equal rights and privileges to all men, irrespectiv of nationality, color, or religion. Encourage free schools, and resolve that not one dollar of money shall be appropriated to the support of any sectarian school. Resolve that neither the state nor nation, or both combined, shall support institutions of learning other than those sufficient to afford every child growing up in the land the opportunity of a good common school education, unmixed with sectarian, pagan, or Atheistical tenets. Leave the matter of religion to the family altar, the church, and the private school, supported entirely by private contributions. Keep the church and the state forever separate.

It has been claimed that this speech was aimed chiefly at the Roman Catholic church. It was not. It was directed not so much against the avowed enemies of the public schools as against its professed friends who would destroy its usefulness by making it the handmaid of Protestantism and the nursery of superstition. Referring to this speech, General Sherman, to whom Grant confided his intention of delivering it, says:

The Des Moines speech was prompted by a desire to defend the freedom of our public schools from sectarian influence, and, as I remember the conversation which led him to write that speech, it was because of the ceaseless clamor for set religious exercises in the public schools; not from Catholics, but from Protestant denominations (Packard's Grant's Tour Around the World, p. 566).

One of the first products of Grant's pen that has been preserved is a letter to his cousin, McKinstry Griffith, written at West Point, September 22, 1839. With the exception of a few brief lines, the last that he wrote was his "Memoirs." It is significant that in each of these—in the one written in the first year of his manhood, and in the other written in the last year of his existence—there is to be found a protest against ecclesiastical domination of our government and its institutions. In the letter alluded to, referring to the demerit marks received by the cadets, he writes:

To show how easily one can get these, a man by the name of Grant, of this state, got eight of these marks for not going to church to-day. He was also put under arrest, so he cannot leave his room perhaps for a month, all this for not going to church. We are not only obliged to go to church, but must march there by companies. This is not Republican (Brown's Life of Grant, p. 329).

In his "Memoirs" he says:

No political party can, or ought to, exist when one of its corner stones is opposition to freedom of thought. · · · If a sect sets up its laws as binding above the state laws; wherever the two come in conflict this claim must be resisted and suppressed at whatever cost (Memoirs, Vol. I, p. 213).

Instead of being a believer in the Christian religion and in favor of Christianizing our government, as many suppose, General Grant was an unbeliever and a zealous advocate of state secularization.

J. E. REMSBURG.

Providence.

II.

Divine providence is that care and superintendence which God is supposed to exercise over his creatures. Believers in this dogma hold that God not only created all things "in the beginning," but that he directs and controls all the affairs of the universe "by the might of his power," down to the minutest details. For doth not the scripture say, "His eyes are upon the ways of man and he seeth all his goings;" that "not a sparrow falls" without his care, and that "he doeth all things well?" He is their "heavenly father," to whom they appeal for protection and guidance and giv thanks for favors received. This view, while fully justified by almost the whole tenor of scripture, is wholly incompatible with the truths of history and evolution and the substantial facts of the universe. The importance of this statement will become evident if we consider for a moment its bearing on the fundamental dogmas of theology. Religion itself is founded mainly upon this belief in a personal, all-wise, all-powerful God. Prayer is based upon the assumption that such a being exists, and that he can and will do something for his creatures which they cannot do for themselvs. "Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name that will I do," is the promis made to his children in his "word." Relying on this the devout believer prays for health and worldly prosperity, communities pray for rain, and nations petition the "throne of majesty" to stay the devastating plague. Revelation, of course, falls with the overthrow of the revealer. A blow at providence is therefore a blow at religion itself. "If God be not God"—that is, if he be not clothed with the attributes with which Theists invest him—then there is no need for religion, whose sole office is to teach man's duties to his maker. If no such being exists the sooner man discovers his gigantic mistake and stops this enormous waste of time and blood and treasure that are daily poured out on the altar to this "unknown God," the better it will be for him. That such a being exists, Theists declare "is manifest in his works" They point to the good in nature as evidence of the existence of a beneficent creator. The sun that givs heat and light by day, the moon and stars that illumin the night, refreshing showers, flowers, fruits, and vegetables—all that contributes to man's existence and enjoyment appears to the devout believer as evidence of the wisdom and beneficence of the most high.

Let us follow out this logic and see where it will lead us. If the existence of good in the universe is evidence of the existence of a benevolent creator, then, by the same logic, the existence of evil is evidence of a malevolent creator. Does evil exist? Not one of us but is forced by the terrible facts of experience to answer, Yes. Man's whole history is but the record of an unceasing struggle against the adverse forces of his environment—a struggle in which countless millions hav perished, scarcely realizing that they had ever lived. He is beset on every side by perils against which he must guard or perish. Heat and cold, tempest and flood, volcanoes and earthquakes, "savage beasts, and still more savage men," menace with destruction on every hand. Disease, inscrutable, insidious, infectious, hideous disease, implacably pursues him, carrying suffering and death in its course, and leaving sorrow and desolation behind. Is this a manifestation of that "tender mercy that is over all his works?" But what shall we say of moral evil, moral disease? Whence came sin into the world? For ages the human mind has stood paralyzed, utterly helpless and dumb before this dread problem. Millions of dwarfed, degraded, wrecked, and ruined natures testify to-day to the awful workings of this dread disease. Prisons and asylums, jails and reformatories, are filled to overflowing with its victims. They lurk in the reeking dens and infest the byways of great cities, a perpetual menace to life and property. Are these the handiwork of that beneficent creator who doeth all things well? Behold the dilemma into which theistical logic has led us? Either the creator is unable to remedy the evils of man's existence, or else he is indifferent to his sufferings. Either view is fatal to the Theist's conception of God. It will not do to say that all this will be righted in another world. For what reason hav we to believe that a creator who has made such a dismal failure in this will ever do any better in another life? The evils which man has suffered will stand a perpetual witness to the injustice of his creator through all the cycles of eternity. If man ever stands at the judgment bar of God, it will be as accuser, not as culprit.

The scriptural account of the origin of sin, "of man's disobedience, and the fruit of that tree whose mortal taste brought death into the world and all our woe," is too pueril for serious consideration by thinking minds. Evolution proves that man is not a fallen but a rising being; that he was not created perfect some six thousand years ago, but has been gradually evolved from lower forms and raised to his present form and condition through countless changes and long periods of time; that sin is not a curse pronounced upon him for disobedience to divine commands, but results from his ignorance and non-adaptation to his environment, and that if he is ever "saved," it will be by his own efforts in subduing and adapting himself to the adverse forces surrounding him and not by the atoning blood of a supernatural savior. That God (if such a being exists) is wholly indifferent to the welfare of his creatures is abundantly proven by the history of the past and the present conditions of life on this globe. Millions of sentient beings daily come into existence but to perish—are born but to die. Even among human beings, who are supposed to be special objects of divine care, not one-half ever reach the second year of their age. The world is one vast charnel house, filled with dead men's bones. "The air is full of farewells to the dying and mournings for the dead." Life feeds on life; millions of organized beings are destroyed that one may liv. Life is a perpetual tragedy; almost every action of our lives is fatal to other forms which, so far as we know, hav as good a right to liv as ourselvs. "Necessity doth make murderers of us all." Did beneficence impose this murderous necessity upon all his creatures? Did omniscience ordain that nine hundred and ninety-nine of every thousand of created forms should perish before arriving at maturity? Could not omnipotence create a world in which destruction and death would not be the natural order—where peace and harmony would reign instead of discord and strife?

The doctrin that the evils of this life were designed for the "purifying of souls" and "fitting them for a higher existence" falls flat when we consider that most beings are debased instead of elevated by adverse surroundings, and that more than half perish before they hav undergone this "purifying" process.

If religionists were not "born insane," as "Saladin" asserts, it would not need an argument to convince them that all phenomena come about naturally, that no supernatural power quells the wrath of the elements or heeds man's pitiful cry for aid. So far as we know, "nature creates without purpose and destroys without regret." "She is neither cruel nor loving, neither tender nor hard-hearted, she merely acts according to laws" which are the expression of the most "stringent necessity."

"I hav searched through the heavens," says Lalande, "and nowhere hav I found a trace of God." Even Luther was forced to admit that "experience shows that God does not take care of this temporal life." If there is no evidence of the existence of God, no manifestations to our senses of the qualities and attributes of such a being, it seems to me that, despite the assertions of Agnostics to the contrary, we are perfectly justified in saying "there is no God," just as we are perfectly justified in saying there are no angels, ghosts, or devils, no fairies or witches or other impossible creations of disordered imaginations. If such a being exists we can know it only by impressions made upon ourselvs; and until such impressions are made upon my mind, this "fool" will continue to "say in his heart 'there is no God.'" He will continue to refuse to debase his manhood by offering fulsome praise to and bowing submissivly before "the shadow cast by his own ignorance." He will continue to believe that there is nothing above or outside of nature, but that the universe "obeys a necessity of nature from which there is no escape."

Science at last has "raised the veil" and solved the Sais riddle. She declares "nature is all that is, that was, or that will be." "She, the all-creating and the all-devouring, is her own Alpha and Omega, her own generation and death. By her power she brought about the so-called creation, and created man as the crown thereof. By her own power she will take him back again when his dwelling-place, the earth, has completed its natural term of life in the endless cycle of worlds." R. WHEELER.

By the census of 1890 the church property in the United States was valued at $679,694,439, and it is estimated that the yearly increase is $30,000,000. Why such an amount of property should not be exempted from taxation is a question ably, forcibly, and practicably considered in a pamphlet issued by "The Truth Seeker Company" of New York and entitled "Church Property: Should it be Exempt from Taxation? Reasons why It should not." In a succinctly incisiv manner the question is aggressivly taken up and places the burden of proof upon its opponents, who, seemingly outside the argument of custom, will hav no little difficulty to maintain their position. For the pamphlet not only forcibly attacks the present system—for it offensivly and defensivly counters and parries the usual points of attack—but also produces figures, facts, and opinions to carry the war into the enemy's camp. The book is one which will well repay the reading, not only by those (and these are many and increasing) who coincide with the views of the pamphlet, but by the supporters of the present system whose sense of justice should at least incline them to recognize the force of the arguments and the seeming necessity of a reply, if such can legitimately be made. Accompanying the pamphlet is a reprint of the company's leaflet which well states the right of individual free thought and action in the observance of Sunday, and givs weighty reasons why no Sunday bill should be passed by Congress.—Boston Ideas.

The legions of devils which were in the hogs when they drowned in the sea, escaped under cover of the water and still haunt pious summer resorts, where they enter young people of religious alphabetical society, when they go in bathing together.

Most of the soldiers engaged in the celestial rebellion were females, and the way they spread their wings and brained each other with war clubs, swords, and cleavers, would indicate that all Christian ladies should be allowed the free exercise of electiv franchise.

News and Notes.

I am now at the home of F. I. Green, Nevinville, Iowa, and from this point I am making a campaign for Freethought. Mr. Green is well known as one of our strenuous workers, and for years he has stood at the front in this community, and kept things on the move so far as courage and generosity can do so.

This is a lovely place, and it is quite a luxury to thus enjoy country life in its exuberance and splendor. The prairie is rolling, and far away we can see the fields, groves, pastures, and comfortable dwelling houses. There is every promis of a magnificent harvest. The corn is simply stupendous. It is as high as my head now, and the green ranks stretch in ocean-like beauty. I understand that more acres are planted this year than ever before. Fields of a hundred acres are before me as I look forth. What is more beautiful than these rustling expanses, from whose bosom will burst the golden ears of plenty? It seems as if there could be no starvation in a world of such gorgeous abundance.

Yet the great strife is going on, and labor is in battle array with capital. I hear but few notes of the conflict in this retired place. I may not be able to return to Chicago after I hav finished my labors here, for I understand that the Burlington is "tied up" with the other railroads, and no tickets are sold and no transportation guaranteed. Well, if I hav to stay for an indefinit period on Green's farm, I shall hav a good time, with plenty of books, beautiful sceneries, harvest glories, and genial companionship; and so be ready when the time comes to unfold the banner of Freethought for the progress of humanity.

I arrived at Creston, Ia., Friday, June 29th, and lectured that evening before the Industrial Union of Creston on "The Rights of Man." The audience was not large, and some present did not seem to think that the "rights of man" included the taxation of church property, and so retired when the subject was mentioned. The People's party is not yet up to the mark. It does not stand for universal justice. It is for half-way measures. However, there are many members of the labor union who realize that Freethought is the key to the situation, and are willing to support lectures that deal with the subject in a radical manner. Mr. Green met me at Creston, and after the lecture drove to his home fourteen miles away; but we had quite a varied journey. The lightnings were playing all around the horizon, while overhead it was pitch dark. The lightning, however, like some great electric dynamo, served to illuminate the road. We could not hav had a more splendid service. But by and by the thunders began to mingle with the lightning, and we had to stop at a half-way house, while the torrents poured down, and this lasted until about two in the morning, and we played "high five" to keep awake, not having any place to rest our weary bones. After we started it was pretty slow work; the roads were well saturated and the mud of a clinging nature. It was daylight when we finished our journey, and I went to bed at sunrise. A good sleep prepared me for another drive, to Greenfield, eleven miles away, where I lectured on Saturday evening.

Greenfield is a somewhat sleepy and churchy place, and as this was the first Freethought lecture ever given the attendance was slight—only about a dozen being present. Yet if every one had come who promised to do so the audience would hav been of fair proportions. Mr. Green worked faithfully for the meetings. The two papers promised to announce the lectures, but did not. The utter indifference of the Liberals in this community is something appalling. They don't go to church; they don't go anywhere outside the church; they don't take Liberal papers and they don't know really what is going on in the world. It is this mass of indifference which, more than anything else, stops the progress of Freethought. I did not giv up in despair, but gave lectures on Sunday and Monday evenings to increased and attentiv audiences, but there were only about fifty in all. I hope some seed has been planted that some day will produce fruit, but the outward appearance is not inviting. If one didn't believe in Freethought with all his heart such experiences would be a damper, and one might say, "Let things drift; what's the use of work?" But a deeper thought will only make us more strenuous than before, for, as we hav no God or devil or hell fire to aid, Freethought must eventually be the only inspiration for the human race; and even if alone we must keep its fires a-blazing, and the world will be aflame or it will cease to advance.

A black storm followed us on Saturday night along our way home, but did not overtake us, although its tremendous folds flapped in our very faces. At this season the thunder showers come and go in Iowa with remarkable velocity. Within a week or two people and cattle hav been killed and the midnight sky lighted with the flames of burning buildings; and yet "God" is on his throne and counts the hairs of our heads! When he gets through counting, perhaps he will save a few lives.

I found one original Liberal at Greenfield—Mr. D. W. Church, who has published some quaint books on the "Enigma of Life," etc. He is quite a philosopher in his way, a sort of transcendental man of science. He is a student of Spinoza, Goethe, Carlyle, and Emerson, and has deeply imbibed their Pantheistic sentiments. He takes somewhat the position of my friend Herman Wettstein, that the universal ether is a kind of universal intelligence, and that this intelligence, if we are open souled, will flow into the brain and illuminate it; and thus we hav a power of insight that transcends knowledge and of which knowledge is simply the instrument. He denies personality to this infinit intelligence, and so practically denies that it is God. It is simply intelligent life. While I of course do not agree that mind is the ultimate fact of the universe, I admit that the position of my friend is anti-orthodox and that his theory is an interesting guess as to what the universe may be, and so long as it does not partake of the nature of a creed I do not object to its intellectual enjoyment. But the more I study into these matters the more I am convinced that Materialism is the common-sense solution of the universe, and drives away all clouds of fancy and superstition.

I shall remain and continue the campaign with F. I. Green until next Sunday. I shall then, if the great railroad strike does not prevent, take my way to northern Michigan, to Red Jacket, Sidnaw, and Drummond. In August I shall push westward to Montana. I shall be in Washington in September, at Davenport and other places. I hope that all friends in Washington who want lectures in September and October will write to me at 234 South Water street, Chicago, care of E. C. Reichwald. Communicate at the earliest possible moment. In spite of the hard times let us push forward the work to the best of our ability. I want to meet and shake hands with as many friends as possible on this tour to the Pacific Coast, and rally our forces. Notwithstanding all discouragements Freethought must triumph. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Freethought and Secular Notes from England.

THE PRESENT SITUATION.

So far as the climate here is concerned, English friends in the United States and Canada need not be anxious to return to the land of their birth. The change in the weather for the worst to which I referred in my last "Notes" has been maintained up to date. Wet, gloom, and chilly winds hav robbed us up to now of the summer sun, and these unwelcome features hav given to nature that somber appearance which is never agreeable, but at this period of the year is particularly objectionable. Perhaps the compensating process may be in operation during July and August; let us hope so, for it is sadly needed. According to the proverb, "it is an ill wind that blows no one any good;" and in this case the unusually inclement weather has caused our indoor lectures to be more numerously attended than they generally are at this season. The audiences at our secular halls, both in London and in the provinces, hav been exceedingly good, and a very pleasing feature of these gatherings is the increased attendance of women and the young of both sexes. It is their coöperation that is necessary to the success of any movement, and the secular movement in England just now is experiencing the benefit of their association. Both in and out of London, Freethought societies are receiving most valuable aid from feminin activity and from the earnest labors of young men. This inspires the veterans in the good old cause with bright hopes for the future of Secular philosophy.

MR. G. W. FOOTE.

I am pleased to be able to report that the president of the National Secular Society is physically himself again. His official position is by no means an easy one, but Mr. Foote's ability and sagacity enable him to perform his duties in such a manner as to giv general satisfaction. It is not surprising, therefore, to find that the appeal now being made on behalf of his testimonial fund is being generously responded to. The fund will be closed and the presentation made about the end of July.

THE SCHOOL BOARD ELECTION.

Activ preparations are being made both by the Progressivs and the Reactionists for the coming election of the school board in November next. It will be a desperate fight between the supporters of theology and the friends of secular education. Present indications giv every reason for believing that the defeat of the cler cal party will be the result of the conflict. Two bye elections for the school board hav recently taken place in London—Willesden and East Ham. At the former place the Progressivs, who had never before won more than two seats at the poll, secured four by large majorities, and they might clearly hav had five, possibly six. The Progressiv candidate who headed the poll with two thousand votes above the leading churchman is a labor man with a decidedly secular program. At East Ham the success was even greater, for six Progressivs were elected and only one churchman. These are striking indications as to future victories. The executiv of the National Secular Society has requested the present writer to contest East Finsbury instead of East Lambeth at the coming election, for the reason that a member of the National Secular Society is already in the field in the latter district and he has good prospects of success. I hav consented to act upon the request of the executiv. My ticket will be an uncompromising one—that no part of the Bible and no phase of theology shall be taught in our public schools. Secular education pure and simple is my motto.

A MONUMENT TO CHARLES BRADLAUGH.

On Monday, June 25, the Bradlaugh statue was unveiled at Northampton in the presence of a vast crowd of over twenty thousand ardent admirers of the late great English Freethought leader. A special train was chartered by the London Freethinkers to convey friends to Northampton to witness the ceremony. Mr. Labouchere, who was to hav unveiled the statue, was unable to attend, being prostrate with lumbago. Mrs. Labouchere came as "his apology"—to use her own expression. She spoke a few words and handed the cord to Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner, who pulled away the wrapper and disclosed the statue, which was hailed with a magnificent burst of cheering, after which the band struck up the old fighting song, while many eyes were wet with tears. The statue and pedestal hav cost about £400, more than £100 of which came from India. The figure is in terra-cotta. It is well posed, and is a fair likeness of Bradlaugh; but the artist has rather missed the massiv character of the hero's face and head. It is suggested, however, that the likeness will improve under the mellowing hand of time. The inscription on the front panel of the pedestal runs thus: "'Thorough.' Charles Bradlaugh. Born Sept. 26, 1833: Died Jan. 30, 1891. Four times elected to one Parliament, in vindication of the Rights of Constituencies. India, too, chose him her representativ. A sincere friend of the people. His life was devoted to Progress, Liberty, and Justice." Several members of Parliament were present, and spoke of Mr. Bradlaugh's noble character and of the services he had rendered to the cause of human progress. Mr. G. W. Foote was appointed to attend the proceedings as representativ of the Secular Association of which Mr. Bradlaugh was for many years the worthy president. Mr. Foote, in a calm and dignified address, gave a brief estimate of the unique qualities of the late junior member for Northampton, and of his persistent efforts to improve the social and political condition of the masses. It was, indeed, a grand and an inspiring spectacle to behold such a concourse of people, holding different political and theological opinions, assembled to pay a tribute of sincere admiration to the memory of one who was not only a great politician, but who was also the most uncompromising Atheist of England. We all know how, during his early career, Mr. Bradlaugh had to encounter fierce opposition, and had to battle against gross misrepresentation and against an unscrupulous bigotry, but his indomitable courage and his never-failing persistency enabled him to surmount those difficulties and to win for himself a reputation of which any public man might be justly proud. While living he won the respect of his opponents and secured the affections of his friends, and now that he is dead his memory is honored and revered by every generous heart that can appreciate honesty of purpose, integrity of conduct, and an impassioned zeal, not merely for the welfare of one class, but for the happiness and prosperity of the whole of the comunity. As an old and most intimate colleague of the great departed I sincerely join in the homage that has just been so willingly and genuinly paid to greatness, and I trust that the deeds of usefulness that adorned the life of the eminent leader of English Secularism may be emulated by all who profess to share the principles which were so thoroughly entertained and so valiantly defended by him who, "though dead, still speaketh." CHARLES WATTS.

Observations.

There is at first sight much philosophy in the remarks of a Western gentleman who says he has differentiated his reading matter, subscribing for secular papers in order to get the political news and discussions of the day, and for THE TRUTH SEEKER, in order to be informed of the progress in Liberal ideas. Whether or not he protests when his secular journals happen to admit to their columns sound notions on religious matters, the public is not hereby informed, but he does object to the discussion of economic questions in his Liberal paper. He is like the old gentleman of New Hampshire for whom I once drew a pitcher of cider. Turning the "spiggot" with one hand and holding both candle and pitcher in the other, some of the tallow dropped into the drink. When the old man got his portion, he noticed the foreign matter floating on the surface and requested that when I went next to the tap I should bring the cider in one thing and the "tarler" in another, and he would mix them to suit himself.

I will not maintain that Freethought and politics can be profitably combined, but I contend nevertheless that the Freethinker occupies an advantageous point of view from which to judge political as well as religious humbugs; and that, other things being equal, the Freethinker is best accoutred to serve the state. Being necessarily of independent mind, he will hav no church or clique to serve, nor anything to gain by deluding his fellowman. His perception will be keen to pierce the "glorified fog" of church and state and to detect the morass into which, as it seems to me, both are at present leading their followers. I am not in favor of blinding him or putting a gag into his mouth; neither do I think the man is wise who closes his own eyes and plugs his ears except to look upon that which is familiar, or to listen to a tale which is thrice told. Thomas Paine was able to teach the American people political common sense, the result being the establishment of a better government than the world had ever known. He would also hav taught them religious common sense if they would listen; but instead they damned him—and incidentally damned themselvs, as we now view the matter. The Freethinkers of this generation hav argued the leaders of the church to a standstill. The dogmas are no longer defended with intellectual weapons; and those leaders, with their allies, the rich, the conservativ, and the greedy, hav entrenched themselvs behind the statute-books, whence they sally forth to annoy, harass, persecute, and oppress. It is their last stronghold, and the question is, whether we shall not annihilate their breastworks and take a fall out of them in their chosen arena. They and their allies here discussed hav given us an administration quite the opposit of the ideal. Our government, established to protect the rights of the citizen, has become a fetich, and the citizen is either forgotten or forced to cringe before it. The sacredness once attached to human rights has been transferred to the statute. We do not hear nowadays of violations of rights or liberties, only of violations of law, as though that were the thing originally to be defended. Our concern, at the present time, is to secure protection, not by the government—we must buy a court in order to obtain that—but from the government; to wit, protection for speech, press, mails, morals, commerce, exchange, and industry, to curtail the liberty of which government has placed salaried officials at every crossroads. Freethought, to employ analogy, holds the same relation to the body politic that the brain does to the muscular system. It directs and guides; and movements not so directed and guided are emotional or involuntary and devoid of a reasonable purpose. Such are religious revivals; such, largely, are popular elections, and such, to a great extent, is the legislation under which we groan. The wise Freethought writer, publisher, or lecturer will perhaps refrain from laying especial stress of voice on these facts. With the fate of Paine before him he knows that though he may be justly rewarded for breaking the manacles of religious serfdom, yet so soon as he lays a hand upon the chains of political slavery, those whom he has most benefited will be first to hit him in the neck. To drive superstition out of literature into the statute-book is only to change it from the altar to the throne, and giv it a club instead of the poison cup as a weapon of offense. It merely revises the citizens out of the theological hell into the political hades.

The Bible idolaters are in the enjoyment of an appreciable advantage over unbelievers when discussing the merits of the scriptures. They may clap their opponent in jail and then go uninterruptedly on with their own side of the debate. It is a matter of fact that the sacred book contains some reams of matter that would be indictable under any statute designed to restrain authors from making an indecent exposure of their thoughts. To this extent we are permitted to speak freely; but the religious person calls us a slanderer, denies the fact, reminds us that the charge rests upon our bare and therefore indecent assertion, and assumes that his denial has as much force as our accusation. We hav to either suspend or proceed to citation and proof. If we take the latter course, what follows? In the case of Mr. J. B. Wise, of bleeding Kansas, arrest and imprisonment followed. This, of course, breaks up the discussion and distracts attention from the merits of the controversy. The authorities, who are orthodox or nothing, and sometimes both, decide that the Bible is not obscene—which is their religion. Then they arrest the person who mails portions of it—which is business. Plainly, they get their system of thought from the modern theologians who hold that the Bible is not the word of God, but contains it—a pied line of type, as it were, from which letters to form the said word may be selected. The inference to be drawn from the theory and practice of the postal authorities is that, in their belief, the Bible does not of itself constitute obscenity, but contains it—a repetition of the process of picking letters out of a pied line. In other prosecutions under the same statute the book, print, or paper—as, "Cupid's Yokes," the Word, or Lucifer—was indicted bodily, the offending passages being deemed sufficient to condemn the entire work. Which way will the present prosecution jump? If an impure passage can taint the whole book that is otherwise innocuous, will the text chosen by Mr. Wise cause the Bible to be excluded? If it is decided that such text does not contaminate the context, why was "Cupid's Yokes" thrown out of the post-office? It certainly could not be maintained, and it never was charged, that all of that work is indecent. It is a pharisee compared with the Bible. We shall be told that Wise selected a passage out the scriptures and mailed it. The rejoinder is that Bennett and Heywood made no such discrimination; and the query arises, Is selection so serious an offense that a man may be jailed whether he commits it or not when opportunity is offered him to do so? Again, in the cases named, the prosecution did the selecting, and, for purposes of information, I am led to ask if the effect of a passage upon the work as a whole can be held to depend upon the person who points it out.

The whole Christian world ought to spring to the defense of Wise. Especially ought the Rev. Vennum to protest against this prosecution. He has been carrying on a discussion with the Infidel with the intent to prove that the Bible is pure. If the accused is convicted Vennum's case is forever lost.

"Sooner than we imagin," remarks Mr. Giles B. Stebbins, "the day will dawn when a godless science will be an unscientific absurdity." Mr. Stebbins should learn that his prediction is aimed in the wrong direction and stated in the wrong tense. The day when God was thought to be a factor in classified knowledge dawned disagreeably and came to an inglorious close a long time since. The great clearness of Mr. Stebbins's thought is manifest in the form of his expression, wherein he refers to a science that is unscientific. He is not far from the kingdom prepared for the California clergyman who, observing that our national charter was secular, not to say Atheistic in character, claimed that it discriminated against Christian believers, and argued thence that the Constitution was unconstitutional.

A labor meeting was held in Union square, this city, the other evening, and just before the solemnities began the Rev. D. E. B. Olmstead, of Cattaraugus county, strolled onto the platform. As nobody knew him, he introduced himself as a clergyman and perhaps expected to open the meeting with prayer, but he was not called on. Among those present were T. B. Wakeman and Charles Sotheran. Mr. Wakeman addressed the assemblage in a speech of some length, and the longer he talked the more fidgety Mr. Olmstead got, so that when the orator closed and walked to the rear of the platform the clergyman uncorked himself and overflowed his nozzle. Said he to Mr. Wakeman, "You hav no right to make such a speech, and any man that would talk that way ought to be arrested." Mr. Wakeman calmly invited him to go ahead and serve his process. Mr. Sotheran stood by as a listener. "The trouble with you folks," said the clergyman, "is that you don't know anything about the teachings of the church." Both Wakeman and Sotheran submitted that they had studied for the ministry and claimed some familiarity with theology. "And your accusations against the capitalists prove your ignorance," sputtered Mr. Olmstead; and he introduced a French quotation. "What's that?" asked Sotheran; "say it again." Mr. Olmstead repeated the phrase, and explained that it was French, which Mr. Sotheran was not expected to understand. "Oh, I see," said Sotheran, who is a linguist; "you mean 'Honi soit qui mal y pense.' Your pronunciation is so bad I did not catch it before." Then Mr. Sotheran wanted to bet the clergyman that the latter couldn't say the Lord's Prayer in Latin, and when Mr. Olmstead acknowledged his inability, Sotheran said, "I'll teach you," and began, "Pater noster que es in cœlis," but the parson interrupted him, with a challenge to debate. Wakeman announced his readiness, and intimated that the present was a good time to begin the discussion. "I am not fully prepared just now," replied the victim. "I thought not," said his persecutor, with a chuckle, and the rural preacher slipped off the platform and made his escape.

Next to the violence and disregard of life and property resulting from the great railroad strike in the West, the most serious thing is admitted to be the damage to commerce and industry. Business is prostrated and the wages which the strikers and those whom the strike has forced out of employment must forego through enforced idleness are reckoned as a dead loss. It is strange that people who see this so plainly hav never thought of the similar loss consequent upon Sunday loafing, to say nothing about holiday and half-holiday idleness. A strike must be a very extensiv one that affects ten per cent of the people of the country, and it must keep that ten per cent idle for ten days in order to equal one day's idleness of the whole population—that is, to equal one Sunday. There are fifty-two Sundays in the year, and the strike must last 520 days, or seventeen months, in order to achieve the sum total of time that would be wasted through the Sunday superstition if "Sabbath" laws were enforced as the orthodox insanely desire. Therefore the loss of wages and the loss to trade through the strike is as a dime to a dollar compared with what the church would impose upon us. Soberly considered, a universal or general rest-day is an absurdity, and I do not believe that it has any excuse for its existence except that afforded by theology, although others are offered. As a boy on a farm, I remember that I thought Sunday every other day, not so much for rest as for recreation, would not be a too frequent recurrence. Later on I noted that I felt less like work on Monday morning than when I quit Saturday night. There may be such a thing as too violent rest. I believe business men will testify that unless they seek some relaxation more exhausting than their ordinary labor, they do most of their worrying on Sunday, which is superior to work as a depressor. The laborer is not in his best form after his Sabbath "rest;" on the contrary he may well conclude that if providence designed the Sunday for any purpose it was only as a day when he might spend his previous week's wages. It is the policeman's harvest time. The church has apprised us that Satan finds mischief for idle hands to do, and she provides the idle hands—a sort of coöperation that runs through the whole Christian system.

After Sunday comes the holiday. If I were the ruler of a people and desired to keep them poor I would multiply the holidays—which is a pointer obtained from the Catholic church, whose calendar is full of them. The United States does not as yet equal Portugal, Spain, or Italy in this folly, but we are getting there. Seven or eight general holidays are observed in all the states, and each state has some of its own. In all twenty-seven public holidays are kept in the several states, to which are to be added numerous church festivals. Saturday afternoon is a holiday the year round in New York, though it is commonly observed only during the summer months. Given 52 Sundays and 10 holidays, and add 8 more days of Saturday afternoon loafing, and we hav more than two months of legal inactivity—about one-fifth of the year, or 20 per cent of all our working time. Expenses for rent and food are maintained, there is nothing coming in (for wages are adjusted to the state of affairs), and every temptation is offered for the profitless spending of money.

That Sundays and holidays tend to reconcile the poor with their poverty is quite apparent; otherwise why should our legislators guard the one so carefully and appoint the others with so much complaisance whenever the matter is brought to their attention?

The following, from a Spiritualist paper, has been submitted to me with the request that I giv my opinion with regard to it:

Yahveh is the luminous ether in which all things exist, the substance from which all things are formed.—Gertrude Love.

The only remark I can think of is that it does not elucidate any matter now in hand.

I am feeding my mind with food that banishes superstition. I wish to liv a life devoted to Freethought, and shall do all I can to relieve my neighbors and workmen (of whom I employ ten) of the cursed influence of the church. My office desk is covered with Freethought works, so my men and persons whom I do business with can read and look at the illustrations. This has led to many debates with laymen; also ministers. The literature I hav at hand enables me to strike hard blows at orthodoxy; also a copy of the Koran which I hav enables me to show that the Mohammedan's religion is much more desirable than the Christian religion. I hav "Bruno" engraved in gold on my eighty-horse engin. Christians often innocently ask me who Bruno was. When I say "Christians burned him," they know nothing of the matter. Some deny it. One minister said the Catholics burned him. "Yes," said I, "but Catholics are Christians."

My position here as a manufacturer has its influence on many who two years ago were believers, but now are quite well posted on Freethought. B. F. P.

It Is a Fair Question.

TRINIDAD, COL., June 14, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Knowing that editors do not always know how to run a paper to please all their subscribers, and believing you will receive kindly the following adverse criticism, I make bold enough to present it:

I am a subscriber, and but for the one exception am well pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER. I receive daily two newspapers that furnish all the politics (free silver and tariff) I want, and at much less cost per word than THE TRUTH SEEKER, and in subscribing for the latter I did it for the Freethought literature it contained. Do you not think your subscribers generally take it for the same reason?

Respectfully, W. E. CHARLTON.

For Free Discussion.

LEAVENWORTH, KAN., June 28, 1894.

GEO. MACDONALD: Go ahead. You hav the same right to air your opinions in THE TRUTH SEEKER that other contributors hav. If not, why not? To be a brother of the editor is a serious misfortune, I admit, but not a crime. The more you smash the graven images of the religious and political idolaters, and the harder you thrust the frauds and humbugs of the day with that free lance of yours, the better you serve the cause of Liberalism. We want no padlocks on Liberal lips.

I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER twenty-one and a half years, and hav never once thought of giving the editor any advice about running it. S. R. SHEPHERD.

From the Tented Field.

LEON SPRINGS, TEX., June 21, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Although not a direct subscriber, I am an ardent admirer of your paper. You will be agreeably surprised to learn the number of Liberals there are in the army of the United States. The only cause that I attribute this to is that they (the soldiers), having time to think and educate themselvs, hav plenty of evidence of the insanity of religion in all its stages from Deism down to Catholicism. The army is composed of representativs of all classes, from the lowest and most ignorant Catholic to the highest and most enlightened Atheist. The one copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER coming to this post is in circulation from the time it arrives until five or six weeks afterwards.

Excuse writing, as it was done in the field. OTTO GLASER.

Under the Standard of the Populists.

BOND, KAN., June 27, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3 for the renewal of my son, F. O. Hellstrom's, subscription. He has not been home here for a long time, but as the paper continues to come I will pay for it.

I agree with George Macdonald's views on tariff and finance and am quite surprised to see that men calling themselvs Freethinkers can object to having those questions fairly discussed.

The People's party is in the field, not only ready but eager for the fray, and will certainly down the cowardly plutocratic crowd. It stands for the plain people on principles which recognize no distinction of sex or creed. The Democrats and Republicans stand for plutocrats' dollars and privileges and they long ago lost all principle. RUDOLPH HELLSTROM.

A Country Editor With Backbone.

LEWISTON, MICH., June 13, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3, for which please extend my subscription. I hang your exquisit paper in the editorial room near the door, where all comers, preachers and women included, cannot fail to behold the striking, edifying, and mirth-making pictures. The preacher looked over one of them and of course saw at a glance that it was not fit literature for poor, degenerate man and now reads them no more. I scatter the paper all through the town and its name is fast becoming the same sound of horror to the holy as the name of Paine and the other noble men we revere.

I imitate the style of Frederick the Great by letting the church people say what they like, and I never fail to speak loudly in defense of the skeptic and Sunday baseball. I advertise the church social and Freethought in the same column. My brother editors hav got tired roasting me for Sabbath desecration.

J. H. PINKERTON.

With Hope and Trust.

ALTOONA, PA., June 7, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I am a Freethinker of the most pronounced type, and I regret only my inability to aid in your glorious work of leading the blind and superstitious into the light of day.

I rejoice in your fight against those fanatics of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and other societies of a similar character; they all belong to the same gang, and are making strenuous efforts to hav that august personage of theirs recognized in the Constitution.

The articles published in your valuable paper from time to time on Church Taxation are grand and to the point, and I hope and trust Freethinkers to a man will fight this out to a successful issue.

JOSEPH MEALS.

Is the Object of Prayer.

MACON, GA., June 7, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $6, for which you will please send the books named. I am trying to spread the "glad tidings" as far as my purse and ability will permit. I hav been the special object of prayer in two of the churches here, and as their God would not answer their prayers by converting me, they have commenced their old tactics—viz., vituperation and persecution, as you can see by the paper I send you. This is the minister that gained some notoriety by strict allegiance to the old Pauline theology, "Suffer not a woman to speak or teach in the church," at a reunion of the Northern and Southern Baptists held in Atlanta last year. He is evidently very narrow-minded, and on this account I shall not reply to his sermon.

Send a few sample tracts that I can cheaply distribute, something effectiv. With best wishes for the rapid enlightenment of mankind (THE TRUTH SEEKER'S mission), I am, yours fraternally,

W. W. FRANKS.

Do Not Forget This Man.

COALING, ALA., June 20, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Will you allow me space to inform the voters of Alabama who may see this what sort of a man W. E. Fitts, of Tuscaloosa, Ala., is? He is on the Democratic ticket for attorney-general of the state and the election comes off in August. I was a state witness in a prosecution and he tried to keep me from testifying because, he alleged, I was an Infidel; that I had circulated a blasphemous paper that caricatured the Bible and made fun of the Christian religion; that I and all such are not far enough removed from barbarism to swear against a fellow-man. Now, the race will be a close one and a few votes lost and he is left out. A man who would deprive another of his rights would deprive him of his property and is not fit for any office. So I hope those seeing this will do their best to defeat him, for he appealed the case and said he would carry it to the Supreme Court, and as it is not settled yet, he may succeed in depriving me of my rights. Yet he never offered to attack my character, only my religion. I had been assaulted one night by a hard character with knuckles, and I was the only witness, but he showed the knuckles and told what he had done a few minutes after the fuss. H. J. WARD.

Suggestions With Point and Pith.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., May 28, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: As inventors are usually investigators, mailing sample copies to their addresses, obtained from the patent office reports, might increase the subscription lists of Freethought journals. Mailing sample copies to writers whose addresses are attached to correspondence in our daily papers might also be good. Being investigators, they would probably be liberal-minded enough to investigate Freethought. Their general intelligence and ability to write for the press would make them specially valuable converts.

If Freethinkers in every locality furnished lists of addresses of all members of debating clubs, members of Unitarian churches, Spiritualists, and other "hopefuls," to whom sample copies could be sent, it might help much.

Judiciously distributing sample copies is a hundredfold better than sowing them broadcast.

If Freethinkers would stand at the exit as debating clubs, Spiritualist, Theosophist, Unitarian, and other liberally inclined meetings dismiss and hand each person a sample copy (as I hav often done), they might aid both in disseminating Freethought ideas and in getting subscribers for these publications.

These suggestions may aid some who wish to work in adopting methods increasing the efficiency of their work.

A Poor Kind of Brotherly Love.

NEW YORK, June 24, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been told time and again that insane people are not conscious of suffering and that they are not capable of knowing right from wrong. Let me state some facts: Willard Asylum is very likely the best institution of its kind in the state. Some twelve or fifteen years ago a young man died there broken-hearted. Some few weeks previous to his death he was informed that on a certain day a Sunday-school party, of which his brother was one of the teachers, would pass down the main road to the lake to go on a steamboat excursion. As there is only a wooden fence dividing the grounds from the main road the insane patient went to the roadside at the appointed time to see his brother and be seen. Imagin, if you can, what must hav been the feelings of him who was hoping for a few kind words from his brother, from one who was of the same flesh and blood, nursed and cared for by the same loving mother, as the company, intent on their day of pleasure, full of joy and happiness, passed along. One among them, a teacher of brotherly love, is so inhuman as not to hav a kind word for his own brother, but passes by in full view of him and disdains to recognize him. Are such men capable of being good religious teachers? These are facts made known by those who were eye-witnesses.

WILLIAM MEESE.

A Very Surprising Assertion.

NEW HAVEN, MICH., June 20, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Says the Christian Witness and Advocate of June 14th: "There is scarcely a vital spiritual doctrin that is not assailed by those who owe all they are and all they hav to the doctrins they assail." Very bad policy for them, to be sure. The Witness's statement is surprising, to say the least, in view of the fact that, since the time of Constantine, these "vital spiritual" doctrins hav, by judicious management, been the means of sustaining and ministering to the appetites of a host of shiftless priests and preachers and reducing the common herd to the requisit degree of ignorance and submission. It is certainly not the fault of the church that the dark ages stopped where they did. By the way, who are these people who, having built for themselvs comfortable nests in the theological tree, are foolish enough to knock the bottoms out of them by repudiating the tenets of Christianity? Do they number among them Baker, Watson, Moody, or the oily-tongued Talmage? Scarcely. Imagin the surprise of one of T. De Witt's audiences, composed chiefly of people who lay up treasures on earth and manage to keep them reasonably secure from thieves and moths, if instead of gushing about celestial streets built on the monometallist plan, paraded by numerous heavenly string bands, and about angels who spend their time congratulating the "Lamb" on his success in holding down the great white throne forever and ever, the reverend gentleman should declare the falsity of the flood story, wonder how the serpent navigated before it was sentenced to go on its belly, and criticise Jehovah's manner of showing his love for the human race by damning multitudes of unenlightened and therefore innocent heathens after ordering their wholesale slaughter by his Jew favorits. How long would it be before Mr. Talmage would cease to hav "the world for his audience" and the Tabernacle fire be regarded as a manifestation of "divine wrath"? Be assured that no such blunder will be made. The Christian religion is not falling to decay because of traitors in its ranks, but because it is a fraud and must go down before the attacks of those who know the truth and are not afraid to speak it. A TRUTH SEEKER.

Worth More for Good than Politicians.

GRAND COULEE, WASH., June 18, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $6.50, for which send me Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," and extend my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Times are hard and money scarce; still, we must all hav "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" and THE TRUTH SEEKER, which will do more to make times better than all the politicians in the country.

Please put America La Follette's name in "Four Hundred Years."

Progress of the Cause in Milwaukee.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., June 7, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to report progress in regard to Freethought in our city. We hav just closed Liberal Club meetings for the season until the 1st of October. They hav been well attended and more interest was manifested than ever before, although we hav held these meetings for the last eight years. I will state here that we hav a free platform—no subject barred—and we hav discussions following each lecture, so that anyone hears all sides of all questions, and in that way there is a greater chance to arrive at the truth. I will giv a list of some of the subjects we hav had before our meeting: "Our Banking System a Confidence Game;" "Railroads;" "Where Was Man and What was He Doing Before the Deluge?" "Woman as an Industrial Factor;" "Theosophy;" "Abolition of the Presidency and the Senate;" "Russian Methods in Milwaukee;" "Recollections of Europe;" "The Plea of Insanity;" "Citizenship and the Dangers of the Republic;" "Holland and the Hollanders;" "Man, Politics, and Religion, and What of the American Protectiv Association?" "Corporations and Trusts;" "Some Clerical and Editorial Criticisms;" "The Authenticity of the Story of the Crucifixion of Christ;" "Landlords, Industrial Slavery, and the Single Tax;" "Growth of the Tolerant Idea in Religion;" "Is Carlisle Justified in Issuing Bonds?" "Catholics in the Public Schools;" "Does Spiritualism Make People Better?" "Modern Spiritualism;" "American Protectiv Association and Politics;" "Some of the Reforms of the Day from a Woman's Standpoint;" "Talk on Theosophy;" "Rev. Mr. Pitsworth on the Authenticity of the Story of the Crucifixion of Christ;" "Economic Evolution:" "E. G. Comstock's Reply to Rev. Mr. Pitsworth;" "Corporation Problem;" "Reformation, Not Punishment for Crime;" "Comstock and Pitsworth Discussion;" "After the Coxey Movement, What?" "The Coming Woman Already Here."

You will see from this list that we hav had a great variety of subjects calculated to interest the people. Our meetings are in such favor here that they are well reported in the different papers of the city, so that they are read by thousands who did not attend the meetings. I would earnestly recommend that other cities get up some meetings on a similar plan. It can be done where there are a few Liberals to take hold and conduct them. There never was a time before in our city when Freethought was so prevalent as now, and I believe our Liberal Club meetings hav done a great work in Liberalizing the people. A. B. SEVERANCE.

[In one respect our Milwaukee friends are more fortunate than is the Manhattan Liberal Club. They hav the aid of their city press in the work of disseminating progressiv ideas. Here it is very rarely the case that our local papers mention our regular meetings, though the Club has had many of the best Liberal and reform speakers on its platform, and the debates are interesting.—ED. T. S.]

An Open Letter to the "Napoleon of Politics."

DELPHOS, O., June 26, E. M. 294.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose a copy of an open letter to Governor McKinley. As he is a prospectiv candidate for president, and seems to be training with the God-in-the-Constitution party, it strikes me that it ought to be generally known.

B. A. ROLOSON.

DELPHOS, O., June 25, 1894.

HON. WILLIAM MCKINLEY, Columbus, O., Dear Governor: It is reported in the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette that, in your speech at the commencement exercises of the Ohio Wesleyan University, at Delaware, O., on the 21st inst., among other very pious things, you said: "I believe that the building of Christian character is quite as important as to hav the well-stored head, and also to hav Christian statesmen is to hav Christian citizens, and that will make itself felt in your halls of legislation,"

As to your personal opinion of the great importance of Christian character I hav no objection. But most really great men and women of this age believe that a vast amount of information is of greater importance than a vast amount of faith in religious dogmas; that knowledge is the prime cause of the great advancement of mankind during the last three or four centuries.

During the ten centuries immediately prior to this era of human progress the Christian character of most of the rulers in Europe was unimpeachable. If they did not hav a Christian character they had no character; and by reason of the former they came near having the latter.

But while you hav the right as well as I to your personal opinion upon this subject, the sentiment of the latter part of the sentence quoted cannot be too severely condemned. In other words, you advise the people to elect to our legislativ halls Christian statesmen, and promis if they do that these Christian statesmen will see to it that the citizens will become Christians and that Christianity will make itself felt in our halls of legislation. There is no doubt that your promises, in part at least, would be fulfilled if the people followed your advice. If the citizens did not become Christian, judging from history and the actions and declarations of Christian bigots to-day, these Christian statesmen would, by means of penal laws, compel the citizens to act as though they were Christians. The land would be filled with religious hypocrits seeking for office. But it may be you agree with T. P. Stevenson, corresponding secretary of the National Reform Association and formerly editor of the Christian Statesman, who, in an address a few years ago, said: "If it be objected that men would become hypocrits to obtain office, we can only say that the hypocrisy which abstains from blasphemy and licentiousness, and conforms the outward life to the morality of the Christian religion, is a species of hypocrisy which we are exceedingly anxious to cultivate."

There is no doubt that Christian statesmen would make Christianity felt in our halls of legislation. Constantine was the first Christian statesman with power to enforce his religious opinions upon others. It was he who caused the assassination of his own son. It was he who caused the murder of his own wife, the partner of twenty years of wedlock, the mother of his surviving children, by suffocation in a hot bath. It was he who cut the throat of his twelve-year-old nephew, and was unmoved by the tears of his favorit sister, pleading for the life of a son. After having seven members of his family put to death in cold blood and been guilty of every crime from assassination to wholesale massacre, he called together the Christian world at the council of Nice. Remember, he was a Christian statesman. He obtained and held the reins of government because of an alliance with the Christians of Rome. In 321, to please the church and "to make it felt in the halls of legislation," he issued the famous edict commanding judges, townspeople, and mechanics to rest "on the venerable day of the sun." The best thing we can say of him is that he is dead. But not being satisfied with the crimes committed in life, by his last will he instructed his children to massacre his brothers and their children, and in carrying out these instructions two only escaped, six being murdered.

It was a Christian statesman who founded and maintained the Spanish Inquisition, where thousands met death by torture for daring to express, or even to be suspected of entertaining, an opinion on religious subjects different from the statesmen's. It was Christian statesmen who instigated the Crusades, in which millions of human beings lost their lives. And their only object was the advancement of Christianity. Every soldier carried a cross as an emblem of his religion. The Thirty Years' War was the offspring of Christian statesmanship. If it had not been for Christian statesmen the heretic-hunts would not be a matter of history. It was they who inspired the invention of instruments to torture heretics, the most effectiv Christian arguments ever promulgated. Christian statesmanship caused the massacre of St. Bartholomew; during seven days of the slaughter no less than thirty thousand human beings fell victims to the treachery of the Christians. They were Christian statesmen who exterminated the Albigenses, the most prosperous people of France, and laid waste its best and most productiv soil. Christian statesmanship is responsible for the execution of hundreds of thousands of innocent persons for the alleged crime of witchcraft. It was nothing else that caused the great witch-hunt in New England in 1692, which was ended only when the jails would hold no more victims. The persecution of Galileo and the banishment of Roger Williams are mild examples of Christian statesmanship. The ashes of Bruno, John Huss, Michael Servetus, and thousands more who hav been burned at the stake, for heresy, a crime manufactured by Christian statesmen with Christian characters, speak loudly against them. I do not object to a gentlemen being chosen for an office simply because he happens to be a Christian. It is the selection of legislators because they are Christians and in order that they make Christianity felt in the halls of legislation, against which I raise my voice.

Nor is this all. You are reported as saying in connection with the above which I hav quoted that "all men from Washington down hav recognized that God rules in the affairs of government." You evidently meant to be understood that all the founders of our federal government, together with all its officers down to this day, believed that the Christian God rules in the affairs of our government. It is a pity that the governor of the great state of Ohio knows so little of the fundamental principles upon which our government is founded. If you really believe what you say, why do you not abdicate the office you now hold and giv the gubernatorial chair to the real governor? Or do you entertain the idea that you occupy your office by divine right? You evidently train with the National Reform Association, the express, primary object of which has been, ever since its organization, to cause our federal Constitution to be so amended as to acknowledge God as the source of all authority and power in civil government. You ought to be aware that in January last, at the request of the officers of this association, there was simultaneously introduced in the House and Senate of the United States a joint resolution proposing such an amendment to the Constitution, and that there were so few favored the idea that it was never reported from either committee to which it was referred.

You were mistaken when you told the people of Delaware that all men recognize that God rules in the affairs of government. You must hav been thinking of the times before Washington, certainly not from Washington's time till now. This is nearly the close of the nineteenth century; the people are somewhat enlightened; the old idea was that the power to govern came from beyond the clouds; that the source of all authority in the affairs of men lay somewhere in the skies; kings sat upon their thrones by divine right. They were answerable only to the gods from whom they derived their authority. The people were not citizens but subjects; they ha no voice in the affairs of government. They were supposed to be owned by the king. The right to rule not being derived from the people, the people had no rights which the king was bound to respect.

The founders of our government believed that individuals had some rights, that nature made all men equal. They denied that any person had the divine right or that any deity had the right to rule over them. They concluded that they had the right to govern themselvs, and in the grandest political document the world ever saw, they declared that "governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." Upon this principle our Constitution was adopted. Our fathers caused to be placed upon the reverse side of the great seal of the United States these words, Novus Ordo Seculorum—"A New Order of Things." They "retired the gods from politics" and enthroned the people as king.

Now, after a century of unprecedented prosperity, you declare to these young men and women who are about to begin their careers of activ life that the people are not the source of political power, that God rules in the affairs of government. You reassert the divine right of those who rule and propose to establish the old order of things, to take a long step backward, a step toward despotism. You would hav Christian statesmen chosen who would make Christianity felt in our halls of legislation. You would connect church and state in all its hideousness.

Your utterances encourage such men as Rev. E. B. Graham, one of the vice-presidents of the National Reform Association, who, in an address advocating the connection of church and state as reported in the Christian Statesman a few years ago, said: "We might add in all justice, if the opponents of the Bible do not like our government and Christian features, let them go to some wild, desolate land, and in the name of the devil, and for the sake of the devil, subdue it, set up a government of their own on Infidel and Atheistic ideas, and then if they can stand it, stay there till they die."

Listen to another vice-president of this association, Jonathan Edwards, D.D., who in one of its conventions held in New York city, in speaking upon this subject, said: "What are the rights of the Atheist? · · · I would tolerate him as I would a conspirator. The Atheist is a dangerous man. · · · Atheism and Christianity are contradictory terms. They are incompatible systems. They cannot dwell together on the same continent."

Remember, all the leaders of the National Reform Association are would-be Christian statesmen. Every one. They would banish to some desolate island all who do not believe as they do on religious subjects, and let them "stay there till they die."

If your theory should be carried into effect there would be laws against heresy, laws against blasphemy, laws against the utterance of honest thoughts. The freedom of speech and of the press would be demolished. There could be no books or papers published which should attack this superstition. Sunday mail, Sunday papers, and Sunday recreation would be prohibited. The Dark Ages would return, and as has been said by the grandest man on earth to-day, "Our land would be filled with theological spies, with religious eavesdroppers, and all the snakes and reptils of the lowest natures, in this sunshine of religious authority, would uncoil and crawl."

Let us follow the advice of Garfield: "The divorce between church and state should be absolute."

Let us hold fast to the sublime declaration of Lincoln; let us insist that this Republic is a government "of the people, by the people, for the people."

B. A. ROLOSON.

REPLYING to a letter sent him by the Anti-Gambling League protesting against horse racing, premier Rosebery says: "My position is simply this: Like Cromwell, whose official position was higher than mine, and the strictness of whose principles cannot be questioned, I possess a few race horses, and I am glad when one of these happens to be a good one."

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Very Good Times.

"The best time I can recollect,"
Said the boy from across the street.
"Was when we played the Spartan nine,
The day that our side beat."

"My best fun was a year ago,"
Said the boy who never will fight,
"When father and I went fishing once,
And slept outdoors all night."

"Well," said the boy from the corner house,
"The jolliest time for me.
Was the summer they took me on a yacht,
And we lived six weeks at sea."

"And the greatest fun I ever had,"
Said the boy who livs next door,
"Was sailing down the river once,
And camping out on shore."

"The very best time I ever had,"
Said the boy with the reddish hair,
"Was in Chicago last July—
The time I went to the Fair."

"It seems to me," said the lazy boy
(And his cap he thoughtfully thumps),
"That the very best time in all my life,
Was the week I had the mumps."

A Visit to Salt Lake City.

[CONCLUDED.]

After sunset the entire building is illuminated with 1,250 electric lights arranged ornamentally, and when viewed from the shore in the darkness it presents a brilliant, dazzling appearance.

During the afternoon the waters around the pavilion were swarming with bathers, who seemed to enjoy themselvs exceedingly, men and women mingling together like school children on their play-ground.

My boy and I, wishing to participate in the enjoyment of the bath, went to the office, obtained bathing suits, and, in a few minutes, we were plunging in the waters of the Great Salt Lake. The water of the lake is so very buoyant that the bather cannot sink; he may float and toss about like a cork in a tub of water, but he can not sink, and he need hav no fear of being bitten by any fish or other water animal, as no living thing is found in the lake. It is said that the extreme saltness of the water is fatal to the existence of all animal life. Salt Lake is a beautiful sheet of water, resembling, in some measure, Loch Lomond in Scotland, but of much greater extent. It is said to be eighty miles long and fifty miles wide, and its greatest known depth is sixty feet. Unlike Loch Lomond the islands of the lake and surrounding mountains are not covered with the "bonnie, blooming heather," so peculiar to the hills and glens of Scotland, but with the wild sagebrush so common to the Rocky mountain region of this country.

As before stated, two concerts were given, one at 4 and the other at 8 P.M.; we attended both and, as a matter of course, it was late (10 P.M.) when we, with thousands of others, left the lake and returned by train to the city.

Next day being Sunday we attended religious service in the Tabernacle, where the same choir that gave the concerts at the lake the previous day conducted the singing. The choir consisted of two hundred and fifty voices. The tabernacle stands on what is known as temple block, near the beautiful temple recently completed. It is a large, plain building, oval shaped, with a seating capacity of twelve thousand, and on this occasion there must hav been eight or nine thousand people present. The speaker's discourse was chiefly an exhortation to obedience. The great organ, 30x33 feet, and 48 feet high, is placed at the west end of the building, and the seats on each side of it are occupied by the choir. Four rows of seats in front of the organ are occupied by church dignitaries, indicating the different degrees or orders to which the occupants belong, thus making a distinction by creating a higher and lower order of the priesthood. But whether such distinction exists in the realms above, your correspondent knoweth not.

The temple is a magnificent building, and will probably long remain the pride and glory of the adherents of the Mormon religion. Above the main entrance on the east end the following inscription appears: "Holiness to the Lord. Commenced April 6, 1853, finished April 6, 1893." It is built of solid granit, and the dimensions, as given by a local publication, are as follows: Length, 186 feet; width, 99 feet; hight of walls, 167 feet; thickness of walls at bottom, 9 feet; thickness of walls at top, 6 feet. There are six towers, three on the east and three on the west end of the structure; hight to top of highest spire, 222½ feet; the whole resting on a footing wall 16 feet thick and 8 feet deep. The interior of the temple is said to be most elegantly furnished. It is not used for public meetings, but for some secret religious rites and ceremonies. The Book of Mormon, they say, does not antagonize or conflict with the scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, but being, they claim, a divine revelation, is merely additional or supplementary thereto.

I fear I am increasing this communication to an undue extent, and must therefore be as brief as possible.

On Wednesday morning, August 30th, we bade farewell to Salt Lake City, taking the train for Denver, Col., where we arrived the following morning. Denver is a beautiful city with elegant stone and brick buildings, and a splendid union depot which was destroyed by fire a few days ago. It was said to be one of the finest railway depots in the country; everything was provided for the comfort and convenience of the traveling public. We remained in Denver one day only, and took the train for Omaha in the evening. At daylight next morning we found ourselvs once more on the fertil plains of Nebraska, which afford a striking contrast to the Rocky mountains of Wyoming, Utah, and Colorado. About 4 o'clock in the afternoon of the same day we arrived in Omaha, having been absent twelve days, seven of which was spent in Salt Lake City and one in Denver. It was not without feelings of regret that we left the mountain scenery so early and returned again to the duties of every-day life. R. S. C.

Correspondence.

BUNDYSBURG, O., May 20, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As it has been some time since I last wrote to the Corner, I now avail myself of the opportunity.

My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am always pleased when I see various letters from the young Freethinkers. It is right that their minds be kept from religious superstition. There is no church in this town; if there were I do not know who would attend, for this little place is not inhabited by religious people.

I hav been going to school. I study history, aritametic, algebra, physiology, grammar, geography, and spelling. We hav only seven months of school in a year, but would like it better if we had more.

I hav one brother; his name is Otis. His age in seventeen.

I hav some house plants. Among them are an oleander tree and a petunia, which are very nice. My petunia is in bloom.

I hav heard Prof. Geo. P. Rudolph, expriest, twice, and I enjoyed the lectures very much. I hope to hear him again.

I hav been corresponding with Miss Grace A. Miller, Osceola, S. Dak., who has written a letter that appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER, March 24, 1894. I am in hopes of getting another one of her letters before long.

Now I will close, with many good wishes for the Freethinkers, both young and old. Let the light shine, and Libertv be our motto. LURA M. FENTON.

CORTLAND, O., MAY 20, 1894.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav been wishing to write to the Corner for a long time, and my papa and mamma wanted me to write to-day. I am lame and I can never walk without crutches. I was blind two years and papa took me to a great doctor in Cleveland, and he opened my eyes, so I can see quite well. I am eleven years old and go to the Cortland high school. I study reading, spelling, sounds, parts of speech, arithmetic, and geography. I hav six brothers and sisters. Papa is a Liberal and takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. We go out riding on Sundays, and when we get back we go up to the mill and look at books and THE TRUTH SEEKER. Papa owns a spoke and handle factory. My brother Roy has a bicycle. He is a very little boy too, to ride with big boys. My three sisters are going to hav safeties in a week, while I receive a tricycle, for I cannot ride their wheels. My little sister Flossie has a doll and she calls it Susan. Papa tells me to say that he has only one church member at work in his mill for him and he is the only one of the men who drinks whisky. Papa reads lots of books and tells us all about evolution, and how men were barbarians once. As my letter is getting long I will close. Hoping to see this letter in print, Your affectionate friend,

CARRIE A. PARSONS.

[A good letter. One thing is evident; Carrie has a good papa and mamma, and she is very bright to be in the high school at her age.—ED. C. C.]

HOUSTON, NEB., April 4, 1894.

EDITOR CHILDREN'S CORNER: While reading THE TRUTH SEEKER I never skip the Children's Corner. In the issue of March 24th I find an article, signed by Walter W. Clark, concerning the greatness of Washington, and that among other deeds of valor, or, if you please, as one proof of his greatness, he conquered himself. Did he? In the first place, what constitutes true greatness? Do we not find the answer in these lines: "Great is the slayer of lions, greater the conqueror of nations, greatest, he who conquers himself." If Washington really did this, he was certainly, not only great, but one of the greatest of men.

From my earliest childhood I was taught to reverence the names of Washington and Jesus. The light and reason of maturer years hav served to cool my enthusiasm and lessen my respect for both gentlemen. I hav no wish to detract anything from the fame of the father of his country that justly belongs to him—"Honor to whom honor is due"—but it seems to me his worth has been overestimated.

George Washington was an aristocrat, a land monopolist, and a slaveholder; while leading the armies in defense of human liberty he was himself a dealer in human flesh and blood; he was president of a lottery company; in short, he and his very aristocratic family belonged to a circle which would be styled to-day the "select four hundred."

But now I come to something which, if true, puts all the foregoing away in the shade. A little more than a year ago a remnant of a newspaper fell into my hands. In an idle moment I glanced over the items left intact and found the following, which I will reproduce in my own words, for the reason that I cannot remember the exact words used by the writer. The facts, if facts they were, burned themselvs into my brain never to be effaced. An old letter had come to light, written by Washington to his aged mother away back in colonial days. It was in reply to an appeal from her for help and means to make her last days more comfortable. She was living in a tumble-down shanty; the roof let in "the sunshine and the rain," the sides the piercing blasts of winter; she lacked proper clothing and was suffering from rheumatism, and asked her son, the father of his country, to let her come to his own house to spend her remaining days. His answer was, that, while he was very sorry that the roof leaked, and he would send a carpenter down to repair the same, it was quite impossible for him to receive her into his house as a member of his family for various reasons, one of which was that Mrs. Washington (his wife) would not consent to the old ladv appearing at the table, as they entertained a great deal of company; this could hav been fixed up if they had been able to furnish the poor old mother with a spare room, where she could be kept out of sight, but all their spare rooms were occupied by guests. He closed by signing himself her "dutiful son."

I hav no clue to the name of the paper in which this appeared, but it was evidently a woman's paper, where published I know not.

Now, what I wish to say is this: If the foregoing is true, and I am of the opinion it is, George Washington never conquered himself; his pride and that of his wife rose like a mountain between him and the poor, feeble old mother to whom he owed his being. Shameful, disgraceful, contemptible beyond all comparison. In the face of this hideous wrong his greatness oozes out into nothingness and becomes like the story of the cherry tree and his little hatchet—a myth of the past. I am told that the Freethinkers claim him as theirs. If this is true, the less they boast of it the better, for he is certainly no credit to their ranks. L. E. R. LAMBRIGGER.

J. M. Peck of Ottumwa, Iowa, writes: "I think the Corner a great and good thing for children, and no damage to old age. I read it every week with as much interest as though we were relativs. I hope you may liv to a good old age. I will never forget our meeting at Chicago."

[We thank our good friend for his kind interest in our work, and we shall always hope to merit his good opinion. We hope the remainder of his days may be crowned with peace and plenty.—ED. C. C.]

EVERY Woman Ought to Read It. Every LIBERAL Woman and Man Will Want It.

WOMAN, CHURCH, AND STATE.

By Matilda Joslyn Gage.

This is Mrs. Gage's latest and crowning work. It is THE book to show how the church has enslaved woman and kept and keeps her in an inferior position. A glance at its contents will show this:

The first chapter—the Matriarchate—shows that under the old civilizations woman had great freedom, but that the tendency of Christianity from the first was to restrict her liberty. In this chapter Mrs. Gage claims that to the Matriarchate—or Mother-rule—the world is indebted for its first conception of inherent rights

Chapter II deals with the theological dogmas of original sin and celibacy. Woman, by the church, was not regarded as a human being; marriage was looked upon as vile; wives were sold as slaves; women driven to suicide; the influence of the church was unfavorable to virtue. The celibacy of the clergy produced degrading sensuality, and woman was the victim of these brutes.

Chapter III is on The Canon Law, showing how the church controled woman by making the legitimacy of marriage depend upon its own control of the ceremony. Ancient civilization gave place to Christian barbarism, the clergy became a distinct body—at once a "holy" and an unholy caste. Learning was prohibited to women, husbands prohibited from leaving them more than one-third of their property; daughters could be disinherited, sons could not. The Reformation effected no change.

Chapter IV—Marquette—is on Feudalism and its degradation of women, the rights of "lords spiritual," the immorality of the heads of the church, baptism of nude women in the early Christian church. It also deals with some of the later-day abuses of females, like our Northwestern pineries, the English debaucheries, governmental crime-makers, etc.

Chapter V—Witchcraft. In the days of this phase of religious insanity Mrs Gage shows how the possession of even a little learning was sufficient cause to suspect a woman of witchcraft, that to keep a pet was dangerous, so rabid were the clergy not to suffer a witch to liv. This persecution for witchcraft was a continuance of the church's policy for obtaining universal dominion over mankind. Women physicians of the Middle Ages were persecuted, and the "Pilgrim Fathers" continued it in America. The first synod convened in America was to try a woman for heresy, and others were stripped and whipped for not agreeing with the clergy.

The chapter on "Wives" shows how the disruption of the Roman empire was unfavorable to the personal and proprietary rights of woman—that the sale of daughters was practiced in England seven hundred years after it was Christianized—that the practice of buying wives was regulated by law—that women were not permitted to read the Bible—that they were not admitted as witnesses—that civil marriage is opposed by the church.

In Chapter VII is shown how polygamy was sustained by the Christian church, that the first synod of the Reformation convened to sanction this institution, that Luther and the other "principal reformers" favored it, as well as the American Board of Foreign Missions. The Mormon theocracy is shown to be similar to that of other Christian sects.

In the last three chapters Mrs. Gage treats of the opposition of the church to the amelioration of woman's sufferings as interference with her "curse," of woman's degradation by the church to labors unfit for slaves, of woman's "inferiority," as taught by the church to-day, and of how little value Christianity has been and is to civilization.

The work is a burning protest against the tremendous wrong done woman by the church, which controled the state. It is also extremely valuable as history. No woman, it seems to us, can read it and remain a supporter of the religious institution which has crushed her individuality, her mentality, and degraded her person. To the woman's cause it opens an Age of Reason. It ought to be widely read for the good it will do.

SEWARD: "Were you aware that Noah understood all about electricity?" Baldwin: "No; did he?" Seward: "Most assuredly; he made the arc light on Ararat."—Brooklyn Life.

THE Rev. Dr. Gunsaulus relates this conversation as having occurred between two New England ladies: Mrs. B.: "Hav you met that Miss Perkins yet?" Mrs. L.: "Yes; I was introduced to her yesterday." Mrs. B.: "To what sect does she belong?" Mrs. L.: "To the Universalists, I believe." Mrs. B.: "Universalists! Why, what do they believe?" Mrs. L.: "They believe that all human souls will eventually, by the grace of God, be redeemed." Mrs. B.: "Oh, they do, do they? What bigotry!"

A CLERGYMAN, who had not been long in Bolton, had occasion to pay a visit to an outlying farm and in returning he completely lost his way. Whilst he was endeavoring to find the right road he met a farmer's boy, who was also bound for Bolton, and who, although extremely astonished at such ignorance, volunteered to show him the way. As they walked along the clergyman asked the boy what his occupation was. The lad told him, and then inquired: "An' whad does ta do, owd mon?" "Oh," replied the clergyman, "it is my duty to show men the way to heaven!" "Eh, gerrout wi' thee," exclaimed the boy, with a knowing wink, "abeawt thee showin' foalks th' way t' 'eav'n, an' doan't knaw t' road t' Bowton!" —London Freethinker.

A FUNNY story comes up from Birmingham, Ala., where that vulgar and illiterate person, Sam Jones, has been holding "revival services." His customary epithets, so runs the tale, such as "You dirty yellow hound dog," "You imp of hell," were frequently used and often applauded. A local negro preacher, Parson Isaac Davidson, heard the expressions and noted the manifestations of approval with which they were received. He was so impressed with the "evangelist's" oratorical curves, so to speak, that he determined to giv his own sermons a similar twist. Accordingly the following Sunday he had not gone far in his discourse before he cried out: "You black devils! You imps of hell! You old sow cats!" Then arose a hubbub. "Kill him!" shouted a big black brother, who sat near the front and to whom the preacher appeared to address his remarks. "Kill him!" was echoed through the congregation. The good old sisters joined in the cry and soon the congregation was upon him. Finally, some charitable person suggested that he was crazy and the parson's own wife indorsed this assertion. He was secured and watched like a maniac. He explained that he was trying Sam Jones's tactics on his congregation, but his people, not having heard that exhorter, could not be convinced that these methods were customary, and had the parson arrested for using "cuss words" in the pulpit. He has not as yet had his trial. If he be convicted, he ought to sue Sam Jones.—Catholic Review.

OLD JONES, PLOWMAN.

Across the cornfield marched old Jones,
And as the plow cut through the furrow,
He sang a hymn in dulcet tones
That sent the chipmunk to his burrow:

"Ul-lass'n did my sa-vyer blee—
Dand id my suv-ren di-ee,
Woo de devote that sacred h——
—— —— —— nation!"

The solemn crow flew o'er the field,
Nor paused to hear the language spoken;
But glad sunlight the cause revealed—
Upon a root the plow had broken,

. . . . . .

Another "point" is set in place,
And once again sweet hope is springing—
Old Deacon Jones, the soul of grace,
The solemn stave once more is singing:

"Wah zit fur crimes that I hav done
He groaned upon that tree-ee,
Um-ma-zing pit-tee gra sun-none,
An dlive beyon d——."

The bluejay screams his wild delight,
The blacksnake hides amid the brambles,
By that fierce language put to flight,
The gray squirrel up the chestnuts scrambles.

For sin is lurking in the path,
As roots beneath the furrow hiding,
E'er ready to distort with wrath
A faith the firmest, most abiding.

So sang old Jones—and so may we Go singing down life's yielding meadows,
Our faith turn skyward, just as he—
Nor fear the touch of sinful shadows.

But when the trial come, ah, then
We fall, like Jones, and raise a ruction;
And rave and roar like other men
Whene'er life's plow meets an obstruction. —Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Miss Wixon has taken as her mottoes in writing this beautiful book of 292 pages—which she has dedicated to the memory of her father and mother—these sentences from the works of a great synthetic philosopher and a gifted liberal minister:

As with the physical, so with the ethical. A belief, as yet fitful and partial, is beginning to spread amongst men, that here, also, there is an indissoluble bond between cause and consequence, an inexorable destiny, a law which altereth not.—Herbert Spencer.

Living is an Art, a method of expressing great conceptions; in fact, the highest method, the noblest of the Arts.—Thomas Starr King.

Pleasure and Progress.

AN ATTEMPT TO PROVE THAT

The Pursuit of Pleasure is the Sine Qua Non of Intellectual, Moral, and Social Development, and that The Promotion of Pleasure is the Duty of Philanthropy and Statesmanship.

By Albert M. Lorentz, LL.B.

CONTENTS:

BOOK I.—PLEASURE: Chap. I.—Sources of Pleasure. Chap. II.—Material Pleasures. Chap. III.—Ideal Pleasures. Chap IV—Social Pleasures. Chap. V.—Pleasures of the Savage, the Barbarian and the Civilized. Chap. VI—Genesis of religions. Chap. VII.—Christianity.

BOOK II.—INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT: Chap. I.—Purpose of life. Chap, II.—Material Pleasures. Chap. III.—Ideal Pleasures: Knowledge. Chap. IV.—Ideal Pleasures: Reason. Chap.—V. Ideal Pleasures: Character. Chap. VI.—Social Pleasures. Chap. VII.—Pedagogical Despotism.

BOOK III.—MORAL DEVELOPMENT: Chap. I.—Morality. Chap. II.—Material Pleasures: Prudence. Chap. III.—Material Pleasures: Refinement. Chap. IV.—Ideal Pleasures: Foresight, Chap. V.—Ideal Pleasures: Civilization. Chap. VI.—Social Pleasures. Chap. VII.—Vice Caused by Restraint.

BOOK IV.—SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT: Chap. I.—Progress. Chap. II.—Protection, Capitalism, and Socialism: Respectively an Actual, an Imminent, and a Proposed Violation of Individual Sovereignty. Chap. III.—Condition of Agriculture. Chap. IV. Public Schools, the Mene. Mene. Tekel of Socialism. Chap. V.—Province of Government. Chap. VI.—Our Social Disorder.

Here are some of the verdicts on this remarkable production which have been rendered by men who are in every way qualified as judges of books:

This is a spirited, rattling sort of a book that skates right along over the deepest subject with out mu h thought whether the ice is thin or not. It answers the greatest question—What is the us , object, motive, purpose, and summum bonum of life, and the real cause and motive of progress? —by one word, Pleasure!—Thaddeus B. Wakeman.

He sharply attacks, also, modern methods of education, and in this he is most abundantly borne out by the facts, and his arraignment is practically unanswerable. His book is altogether a curious and suggestive one.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

The man who wrote this book knows how to write a book, and knows what he is writing about. There is not a padded sentence in the volume, not an attempt to fill up with words for lack of knowledge. The author deals hard blows at shams and falsehoods, and hard blows for realities and truth. We do not see how anyone can read this book and disagree with the leading propositions, The work is good; every chapter is worth reading. It is a work of common-sense Socialism. The chapter on public schools ought to be put into a tract and sent to every teacher in the land. Thousands of sentences are worthy of being framed as political maxims and hung up all over the nation. the book deserves a wide reading, not only for its literary style, which is clear and incisive, but for is bold, honest sayings.—L. K. Washburn.

After you read this book you will be as enthusiastic in praise of it as are the eloquent editor of the Investigator and the gallant President of the Canadian Secular Union,

Pleasure and Progress" has 398 pages, is splendidly printed from large, clear type, on excellent paper, and costs, bound in cloth, $1; paper covers, 50 cents.

The Creation of God.

By DR. JACOB HARTMANN.

An explanation of the origin of the God Idea, and the mental processes that led to the formation of idols and the worship of them. From the time of Terah's apostasy, Abraham's reformation and his banishment for heresy and blasphemy against the Chaldean idols, to Christ's coming, the principal characters are analyzed and shown to be human, by thought and deed. It is made plain that the peculiar phraseology, cant sayings, subterfuges, miracles, wonder-workings, and supernatural padding are the proper offspring of the then existing barbarism, ignorance, and superstition, constituting the peculiar politics of the day.

Gems of Thought.

We hav never witnessed the construction of a world. We only perceive the everlasting flux and reflux of phenomena, the ceaseless pulsation of nature and life, evolution, transformation, birth, death, and birth again. But nature herself is dumb as to her whence or whither—Prof. W. Knight.

Hot-headed philanthropy, impatient of criticism, is, by helter-skelter legislation, destroying normal connections between conduct and consequence, so that, presently, when the replacing of justice by generosity has led to a redistribution of benefits irrespectiv of deserts, there will be reached a state having for its motto the words: "It shall be as well for you to be inferior as to be superior"—Herbert Spencer.

They [children] will ask you whether the story of the creation of the universe is true; whether such and such miracles really happened; whether this person or that actually lived, and actually did all he is said to hav done. Plainly, the right course is to tell them, without agitation, or excess, or vehemence, or too much elaboration, the simple truth in such matters, exactly as it appears to one's own mind.—John Morley.

Cain and Abel hav been dead between five and six thousand years. According to the never-dying soul dogma, Cain has been suffering the pangs and pains of hell-fire from death till now. Abel has been enjoying the bliss of heaven from death till now. At the day of judgment their "immortal souls" will be reunited to their "resurrected bodies" to be judged, then sentenced. One back to his everlasting burnings, the other to his abode of bliss. Does any sane person believe it?—Anglo-Angelus.

Above all, I must have a definit and distinct conception of him in whom I am to believe, whom I am to imitate as an exemplar of moral excellence. A being of which I can only catch very fitful glimpses, which remains obscure to me in essential respects, may, it is true, interest me as a problem for scientific investigation, but it must remain ineffectual as regards practical influence on my life. But a being with distinct features, capable of affording a distinct conception, is only to be found in the Christ of faith, of legend, and there, of course, only by the votary who is willing to take into the bargain all the impossibilities, all the contradictions, contained in the picture. The Jesus of history, of science, is only a problem; but a problem cannot be an object of worship, or a pattern by which to shape our lives.—D. F. Strauss.

Perhaps it has never struck the majority of our ministers of religion and our moral teachers that the knowledge of these frightful tortures, that are now inflicted on animals in the name of science and humanity, has done much to rob many persons, not merely of religious faith, but of all faith in the moral government of the world, and of all hope, driving them to the blackest pessimism and the most dreary forms of materialism. Human suffering, at least, can be more or less accounted for by human sin, but animals are innocent and irresponsible; created helpless, and yet capable of pain, to be handed over to be tortured by man. By many the thought cannot be evaded: What if the Power of the universe should treat us, who lie at its mercy, as we treat those whose helplessness tempts us to seek our own welfare through their anguish? And if we are thus the sport of superior strength, what right hav we to complain who take a cowardly advantage of our own opportunities with such savage selfishness?—Mona Caird.

The simple fact is, that, as I hav already more than once hinted, my story is that of the wolf and the lamb over again. I hav never "gone out of my way" to attack the Bible, or anything else. · · · I had set out on a journey with no other purpose than that of exploring a certain province of natural knowledge; I strayed no hair's breadth from the course which it was my right and my duty to pursue, and yet I found that, whatever route I took, before long I came to a tall and formidable-looking fence. Confident as I might be in the existence of an ancient and indefeasible right of way, before me stood the thorny barrier with its comminatory notice-board—"No Thoroughfare. By order, Moses." There seemed no way over; nor did the prospect of creeping round, as I saw some do, attract me. True, there was no longer any cause to fear the spring-guns and man-traps set by former lords of the manor; but one is apt to get very dirty going on all-fours. The only alternativs were either to giv up my journey—which I was not minded to do—or to break the fence down and go through it.—Professor Huxley.

LOGIC OF DEATH,

—OR,—

Why Should the Atheist Fear to Die?

By J. G. Holyoake. Price, 5 cents

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By George J. Romanes.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A Nineteenth Century Novel.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. ON July 5th the far-famed "Court of Honor" buildings on the World's Fair grounds were destroyed in a incendiary fire. The structures were the Terminal station, Administration, Manufactures, Electricity, Mining, and Agricultural buildings and Machinery Hall. Some lives were lost.

THE amended tariff bill has passed the Senate by a vote of 39 to 34. Hill was the only Democrat to vote nay. Populists Allen and Kyle voted for the bill, and Peffer and Stewart against it. The measure now goes to a conference committee. The Ways and Means committee of the House recommends the rejection of the Senate amendments. The Senate members of the conference committee are Voorhees, Harris, Vest, Jones (Ark.), Aldrich, Sherman, and Allison. For the House: Wilson, McMillan, Turner, Montgomery, Reed, Burrows, Payne.

THE all-absorbing topic this week is the railway strike ordered by the American Railway Union. The shop employees of the Pullman company could not secure an adjustment of their differences with the company. Then the American Railway Union ordered a sympathetic strike. It has spread over a greater portion of the West, Northwest, New Northwest, Pacific Coast, portions of the Southwest, and into Alabama. In several states freight traffic is partially or wholly suspended, and passenger traffic greatly interfered with, while the mails hav been much delayed. Much railway and some other property has been destroyed. In Chicago, the storm center of the trouble, the Pennsylvania road alone has had nearly seven hundred freight cars, one hundred of them loaded, burned and some other property destroyed. Other lines hav suffered severely. Suburban passenger business and milk and ice movements are largely at a standstill. The Illinois Central is one of the heaviest sufferers, the Southern fruit trade being largely over its lines. This is, of course, a bad blow to the semi-tropical and Southern states fruit raisers. The Rock Island is paralyzed to the Missouri river and several of its rival lines are in nearly as bad a position. At Battle Creek, Michigan, hundreds of passengers were held for several days. Many towns and cities from the western Minnesota line on toward the Pacific are in sore straits for provisions and, prices hav gone up enormously. Fruit supplies from California and live stock shipments from the Southwest are greatly lessened. Hundreds of thousands of men in industries dependent upon the regular running of the trains are out of work, as are large numbers of railroad workmen who hav not struck, but whose roads are crippled by the strikes on connecting lines. The League of Railway Trainmen refuses to strike and says it will expel individual members who do. Santa Fé conductors and Denver & Rio Grande engineers hav asked to be and hav been sworn in as deputy marshals and armed. There does not seem to be any doubt that the places of all strikers would be filled and business proceed if it were not for the violence of a fraction of the strikers and of the tough elements. State troops hav been called out in Alabama, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Colorado, California, and elsewhere. Large numbers of deputy United States marshals hav been sworn in and federal troops are held in readiness at all posts. The Fifteenth Infantry has been called out from Fort Sheridan in Chicago and the Ninth has been ordered forward to the same point from Sackett's Harbor, New York. Gen. Nelson A. Miles is in command in Chicago. United States Judges Woods and Grosscup hav issued sweeping injunctions against strikers and rioters. This has been done to secure the regular movement of the mails and to protect inter-state commerce. The government announces its intention to keep open the three Pacific lines as military and post roads, which they are by their charters. Governor Altgeld of Illinois has sent two very long telegrams to President Cleveland, protesting in the name of local self-government and state rights against the use of national troops in that state. He says that he has ample force at his command to stop all disorder. President Cleveland replies briefly, saying that he is wholly within the law in all that he has done, and hinting to the governor that it will be better for the latter to do what he says he can do so easily, rather than to waste time in talk. On Sunday last President Cleveland issued a proclamation warning all strikers and others within the state of Illinois to desist from further unlawful acts and calling upon all other citizens to refrain from mingling in any mobs. Those who obstruct the mails, interfere with commerce, and destroy property are characterized as "public enemies," and all necessary force will be used to compel respect for law and individual rights. Of course the strike leaders, including President Debs of the American Railway Union and Master Workman Sovereign of the Knights of Labor, protest against the employment of national forces to secure the clearing of the tracks and dispersal of mobs. Rioters in Chicago who were destroying railroad property and stoning the militia and police were fired on last Saturday and several were killed or wounded. At Hammond, Indiana, just over the Illinois line, a mob attacked a small company of United States troops and some were killed. This mob had just previously nearly killed several railway employees who had refused to quit work. In California the strikers are in possession of Oakland, San Francisco, and Sacramento, the state militia apparently sympathizing with them. One company, indeed, surrendered its arms to them. There the situation is very grave. The strike has extended as far East as Cleveland. The later reports are that the railroad men in other Ohio cities refuse to quit, but agents of the American Railway Union are activly at work in the East endeavoring to induce all railway employees east of the Ohio to join the strikers. It is feared that the Central Labor Union of Chicago will order a general tie-up and rumors of a like action in other cities are heard. Iowa troops opened the lines at Sioux City. Fruit, vegetables, coal, ice, and milk are scarce in Chicago and high in price. The governor of North Dakota has had to telegraph to Debs asking permission to bring the state militia home from their summer encampment. American Railway Union men at Baltimore, Louisville, and many other places hav, so far, refused to leave their places. Chicago Typographical Union sends a protest to the president against his attempt to open up the lines of travel, commerce, and communication, which attempt it calls "supporting the corporations." The latest reports are hopeful, trains running more regularly than for several days previously, but as Pullman refuses to submit to arbitration it is probable that 100,000 more men will go out in Chicago. President Cleveland has issued another proclamation, warning all unlawful combinations in North Dakota, Idaho, Montana, Washington, Wyoming, Colorado, California, Utah, and New Mexico to disperse and retire peaceably to their respectiv abodes. A conflict between the strikers and the national troops is imminent in California. Troops hav started for Sacramento. Several papers openly advocate resistance. Railroad men at Toledo, Ohio, hav struck. The first meat train (fifty-five cars) since July 4th from the Chicago stock yards got out July 10th.

THINGS MADE HOT FOR SHADRACH, MESHACH, AND ABED-NEGO.

CHEAP EDITION.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

Modern Marriage.

By EMILE ZOLA.

Translated from the French by Benj. R. Tucker

In this his latest story Zola takes four typical marriages—one from the nobility, one from the bourgeoisie one from the petty bourgeoisie, and one from the working-people—and describes, with all the power of his wondrous art, how each originates, by what motive each is inspired, how each is consummated, and how each results.

"With Daughter's Babe Upon His Knee."

A new edition of that splendid prose poem, "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt boveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

WHAT MAY HAPPEN—ONE VIEW OF THE WOMAN SUFFRAGE QUESTION.

UNCLE SAM (sotto voce): If Jesus is their king they hav no business meddling with my ballot-box.

Wanted—More Subscribers.

We solicit the kind attention of our friends to the need which exists of increasing the subscription list of THE TRUTH SEEKER. There are several reasons for this, which our readers will readily see. First, It will do a world of good, by making more Liberals and by interesting those already liberal in the work of Freethought. The church is making great encroachments upon our liberties, and the people need to know about it, in order to defeat its tyranny. And those who read THE TRUTH SEEKER are a hundred times more interested and activ than those who do not. Second, It is a duty we owe to our fellow-men to giv them the light of reason we hav obtained. Liberalism makes for true civilization, and freedom from fear of an angry God makes men happier and better. Every Liberal should do all he can to lift up his neighbors from the darkness of superstition to the glorious plain of mental liberty. And, as Mr. Wakeman says, referring to the resolution regarding the Liberal papers passed at the late International Congress: "They are the very life of the cause of intellectual and practical emancipation of the people. As such they are to be built up and sustained by constant care, payment, encouragement, and solicitation for subscribers for them." Third, An increase in the list will relieve the readers from the occasional "duns" we are compelled to send out in order to get money with which to pay bills. If we can obtain two or three thousand new subscribers, the increased revenue will make the business work of the paper easier, and we can continue to improve the paper without fear of financial embarrassments.

To reward those who will do a little for us in this matter we hav arranged to take a large number of Mr. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," and to every one who sends us four new yearly subscribers at the regular rates of $3 ($12 in all), we shall send a copy of that magnificent work free. Those who send the club before the book is off the press will be enrolled among the original subscribers and patrons in the book.

And to make it easy to get these four new subscribers we will offer them as a premium either of two splendid works—The "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated," or W. S. Bell's "Handbook of Freethought" in cloth binding Our readers know the value of these books, and that about every Liberal in the country would like a copy of one or the other. Either one of these, as may be chosen, will be given to the new subscribers obtained in these clubs of four, and a copy of "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" to the one who gets up the club and sends the money and names.

We cannot afford to make this premium to single subscribers, but to enable old subscribers and single new subscribers to obtain these and other desirable works at a great reduction, we hav made a list of premiums in connection with subscriptions to the paper, to be found in the first column of the first editorial page of THE TRUTH SEEKER. We are willing to do our part toward making the obtaining of good Liberal works easy and cheap, and hope our readers will take advantage of the terms offered.

Once more we ask that a favorable eye be turned in our direction, and a helpful hand extended. As the resolutions of the International Congress expressed it, Boom the Liberal papers and you boom the Liberal cause.

We can still supply THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 9th, containing the copyrighted addresses of Colonel Ingersoll, T. B. Wakeman, and Henry Rowley, and others delivered at the Paine Memorial celebration at New Rochelle, May 30th. This is a finely illustrated number, and those who send for it at once will be the recipients of a charming souvenir. Seven cents per copy, five or more copies, five cents each.

A twelve-page protest against the Sunday bills offered in Congress by Kyle, Johnson, Gallinger, and Morse will be sent for five cents. Twenty-five copies, three cents each; one hundred copies, $2.

Never publicly espouse a so-called "reform" until you hav treated yourself to at least a genera acquaintance with what has heretofore been said and done along that line.

The Christian Amendment in New York.

The National Reform Association, ever anxious to inject the religious opinions of its members into the statutes and constitutions of the country, has sent one of its secretaries to Albany to help patch the organic law of our state. Mr. William Weir is a citizen of Pennsylvania, a state which contains more irreconcilable cranks, of diverse and sundry patterns, than any other commonwealth in the Union. Some of its fanatics can always be depended on to head every movement intended to meddle with the concerns of the people in general and the affairs of other communities. Almost every crime against the equal religious, moral, commercial, industrial, and civil liberties of our citizens, if it did not hav its birth, received at least its most careful nursing in that state. There seems to be something in the soil and atmosphere favorable to the development of bigots of all kinds. It was in that unhappy province that the scheme to inundate Congress with fraudulent petitions for the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday was hatched, and there it was that the forgery attained its most colossal proportions. With a population of some more than five millions, upwards of fifteen millions of "names" were attached to the petitions specified. Now an inhabitant of that nature-blessed but man-cursed kingdom comes over into New York on a mission of reaction. He wants our Constitutional Convention to make a bad matter worse by the incorporation in the preamble of the Constitution of a clause recognizing Jesus Christ as the upbearer of the government. The preamble at present reads as follows:

"We, the people of the State of New York, grateful to Almighty God for our freedom, in order to secure its blessings, do establish this Constitution."

Now, it is perfectly safe to say that the people, even most of the deeply religious men and women of the state, do not believe this. It is merely formal claptrap. On the Fourth of July and Washington's birthday the people celebrate the sufferings and achievements of the men of the Revolution who cemented in their blood the foundations of the Union. On Decoration Day they do honor to the memory of those other men who, in a later crisis, gave their lives to preserve that Union. On every occasion the orators and the poets, the essayists and the toast writers and speakers, say a thousand words about the human authors of such freedom as we possess to one word concerning the dream-god of the skies. There are, of course, some few, usually perfunctory, allusions to "providence," "God's guidance," and "his loving watchfulness," but even the most stupid readers and auditors are impressed with the truth that this republic was founded, fought for, and maintained by men "who walked this solid earth." In view of these indisputable facts, we heartily agree with the National Reformers that the preamble of the Constitution should be amended. This is the way we would hav it read:

"We, the people of the State of New York, grateful to all the men and women of the past who hav helped attain, by their labors and sacrifices, the freedom we now enjoy, in order to secure its blessings, do establish this Constitution."

It can be said in favor of this proposed amendment that it is on every side impregnable to assault. It is buttressed by history, science, logic, and good sense. But what excuse is there for the substitute offered by Mr. William Weir, of Pennsylvania? Here it is:

"We, the people of the state of New York, grateful to Almighty God for our freedom, in order to secure its blessings, as a Christian people in the name and by the authority of our Lord Jesus Christ, on whose shoulder is the government, do establish this Constitution."

Note the false statements in that brief paragraph. First, an unlocated and unlocatable "God" is the author of our freedom. On the contrary, the past is the parent of the present. Out of primeval darkness and savagery hav evolved the sentiments, thoughts, sciences, inventions, and institutions of this comparativ enlightenment and civilization. We can trace the slow and devious march step by step. It is not a matter of guess-work; it is capable of demonstration, and has been demonstrated. Our social, religious, and political freedom is not the child of revelation, but of growth. It did not come from without, but from within.

Next we are told that we are a "Christian people." This is true only in the sense that the majority nominally adhere to the Christian faith. The state is neither Christian nor Infidel. It can be neither with safety to the minority. It is secular, in spirit and intent, if not in letter, and actually. In so far as it is theocratic by perversion, it must be reformed. We should look and move forward, not backward. It is perfectly feasible to protect the religious and civil rights of all if the state is made or kept secular, as its present status may necessitate. But it is impossible to extend that protection if we put creedal limitations into the Constitution and statutes. No majority can resist the temptation to use unjust power when that power is close at hand or easily obtainable. Union of church and state must be prevented at whatever cost. Recognition of God and Jesus in the Constitution is union of church and state. To argue that it is not is playing with the loaded dice of word jugglery.

"In the name and by the authority of our Lord Jesus Christ." But a large fraction of the people of this state do not invoke the name nor recognize the authority of any non-elected man, dead or living; and as for "Jesus Christ," they cannot admit that he is their liege Lord. They are a part of "we, the people," and will not consent to help establish a government in the name of what is, to them, a myth or was, at most, an ordinary mortal, "long since dead and turned to clay." They claim —and rightly—that none of their duties as citizens or neighbors hav their source in the alleged fact of his existence nor in their belief in said alleged existence. The American national government and states are organized to perform certain definit functions, none of which is the teaching of religious or anti-religious dogmas, therefore the incorporation of any of those dogmas in the organic or statute law is utterly wrong, indefensible, and dangerous.

Lastly, we are asked to believe that on the shoulder of this Jesus Christ rests the government of the state of New York. This is the sheerest assumption, and a theological assumption at that. With the exception of a few, a very few, assertions like that made in the preamble everything in the Constitution and enactments presupposes or positivly affirms that the people made, may and do modify, and support and defend this government. So far as the procedure of our courts, boards, bureaus, et al, is concerned, Jesus is a coruscating generalization of which no more account is taken than of the firefly that sparkles fitfully in the shadows of the summer night. It is a government of the people, for the people, and by the people. It is not within telescopic sight of the goal of perfection, but all its "divinely constituted" rivals hav been left hopelessly behind in the race. To assert that this government of the people of to-day rests upon the shoulders of a man said to hav lived nineteen hundred years ago, and who knew nothing of the conditions and problems of the present time, borders perilously close on the ravings of insanity. The demand that this incoherent and baseless assertion shall be made a part of the fundamental law is intolerably insolent. Men are at perfect liberty to believe all such dogmas and to build churches and pay ministers to assist in their propagation, but when they ask that the state, the state of all the people, shall recognize said dogmas, and join in the preaching thereof, they go a step too far and must be made to understand that they are the enemies of liberty and justice. Such is the position occupied by the National Reform Association.

Mr. Weir writes in the Christian Statesman that when his amendment was presented to the Committee on Preamble and Bill of Rights, it was found that the committee had already adopted the preamble first quoted. But the committee reconsidered its action that the new form might come before it and Mr. Weir be heard. The Covenanter missionary continues:

"So soon as the secretary of the committee read the amended form of preamble, a tall, thin, gray haired and whiskered gentleman strongly objected to having anything to do with it. The remainder of the committee, however, promptly declared they would hear the case, whereupon the old gentleman pushed back his chair and strode from the room. Inquiry revealed that he was an Infidel. Is the skeptic spirit that will not even listen to the reasons of its opponents any very great improvement upon the 'religious bigotry' which they find joy in denouncing?"

The only mistake made by the "Infidel committeeman" was in not remaining and tangling up the Covenanter in a cross-examination. But he probably reasoned—and correctly—that neither the committee nor the convention has properly anything whatever to do with religious tenets, except to kick out such as are already in the Constitution. No employee of the state is in duty bound to help run the machine or pour on water for preachers who are trying to grind their private axes at the state's expense. It is purely a matter of taste whether he does or does not help furnish an audience for Mr. Weir, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Weir is an interloper and would-be mischief maker, and whatever attention he receives is his as a matter of long-suffering courtesy, not as a right.

After the ambassador from the Keystone state of superstition had made his speech before the committee "a gray haired member" asked to see the proposed amendment. Reading it, he said:

"I shouldn't like to say this is a 'Christian people.' And I shouldn't like to say 'in the name and by the authority of Jesus Christ.' And I shouldn't like to say 'the government is on his shoulder.'"

Mr. Weir does not say how this calm rejection of his amendment, part by part, affected him, but we are encouraged by it to hope that even the theistic clause may be eliminated from the preamble if the Freethinkers and other progressiv, liberty-loving people of the state make themselvs heard and felt at once. In this connection it should be stated that "two or three" other amendments "of similar import" were before the committee "but none of them so broad" as the Pennsylvanian's.

The New York members of the Freethought Letter-Writing Corps will this week write to the Committee on Preamble in condemnation of and argument against the proposed Christianizing of the state Constitution. Point out also the absurdity and injustice of the theistic clause. Demand an absolutely secular Constitution. The members of the Committee on the Preamble are:

J. M. Francis, Troy (chairman); Thomas G. Alvord, Syracuse; Augustus Frank, Warsaw; W. L. Vandenberg, Amsterdam; N. A. Woodward, Batavia; M. L. Parker, Lyndonville; John G. Schumaker, Brooklyn; John Bigelow, A. H. Green, G. J. Tucker, New York; Veeder, ———.

Edward Schwella, president of the Freethought Federation of Austria, died May 18, 1894. Mr. Schwella started the Free Religious society, which has a membership of six thousand. "The biography of him is virtually a history of the Free Religionists," says Mr. Putnam in "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." The Austrian government compelled Mr. Schwella to confine himself to scientific lectures of a popular character, and levied a tax on the society for each lecture delivered. Lack of "reverence" for orthodoxy has several times gotten Mr. Schwella before the courts. It would seem that the one thing which "the powers that be" most fear and hate is the expression of unorthodox opinions about religious subjects. The termination of the career of Edward Schwella is a severe blow to the Freethought cause in Austria-Hungary.

Sunday Platitudes.

Col. Alexander S. Bacon, who livs over in Kings county, in an address delivered recently before the Kings County Sunday Observance Association said that no nation could remain a republic if it did not observe its Sunday laws. This nation is already endangering its existence by failing to do so more rigidly. The man of the militia also observed that the intellectual, moral, economical, and political welfare of the people depended upon the suspension of all labor on Sunday. "Sunday laws were based on the laws of nature, which requires that men should rest on one day in seven. A man can not be much above a brute if he spends seven days in degrading toil." We do not know what, if any, connection there is between Colonel Bacon's remarks and the fact that he is one of the numerous aspirants for the Republican nomination for governor of this state. We do know that his assertions will not for a moment stand examination.

If obedience to Sunday laws is essential to the perpetuity of republics what effect will such laws hav upon the longevity of kingdoms and empires? How can the defensiv power of the citizen be strengthened by compelling him to surrender his self-sovereignty one day in seven? If he can rightfully be compelled to abstain from work on Sunday why cannot he legitimately be forced to do such work on the other days of the week as society chooses for him instead of the work he would select for himself?

It is ridiculous to say that the "intellectual, moral, economical, and political welfare of the people depends upon the suspension of all labor on Sunday." At least half of the so-called "Sunday rest" of the present time is aimless idling that in no way conduces to the well being of the citizen nor of society. There will be a very great improvement when the last trace of reverence for Sunday as a holy day is effaced from the minds of the people and all places of recreation and instruction are wide open on that day as on all other days. Then millions more of the people will hav the opportunity to admire and study nature and art, to read books, to engage in games promotiv of physical vigor and conduciv to clearness of thought and ethical health. But that the masses may properly utilize their weekly day of rest there must ever be engaged a small army of Sunday workers, who, in turn, will rest on other days if they choose. What is needed in solving this very simple problem is common sense. The ordinary preacher should keep silence, for the rational Sunday endangers his present craft, and so he cannot contribute unprejudiced thoughts.

"Sunday laws are based on nature, which requires that men should rest one day in seven." Is that so? Where did Colonel Bacon get the information? The year, the month, day and night, are natural divisions of time, but where has that overworked authority set apart the week? Referring to the indications which nature givs us, it is plain that man has generally rested at night and worked during the hours when, in common parlance, the sun is above the horizon, but in our modern complex industrial civilization millions of men hav reversed this arrangement. Why does not Colonel Bacon propose a law forbidding night labor? Such a statute, while no less irrational and invasiv than Sunday laws, would be much more in harmony with "Nature's" plain commands.

There is no objection to voluntary abstention from labor on Sunday and avoidance of amusement and instruction. What we demand is freedom of choice for all. Away with meddling laws, and the roiled waters of "rest" and "labor" will clarify themselvs.

If labor is not "degrading" on six days of the week it is not likely to demoralize so very much if one more day is added, if added by the choice of the worker. However, this question does not need to be discussed so long as there are more workmen than places to work. The "rest day" is ready for all, but it cannot come for all the same day of the week and it must cease to be compulsory anywhere.

A Missionary Scheme.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has recently been doing, with the generous aid of its friends, a great deal of political missionary work. We hav given away thousands of the "Church Property" pamphlet, and it is doing its work, in this state particularly. We hav also given away thousands of arguments against the proposed national Sunday laws. Besides these, more thousands of TRUTH SEEKERS hav been scattered broadcast over the land.

With the advent of hot weather the political bodies will soon adjourn, but the people of the country will remain in session right along. And they are of not less importance than the politicians, and we want to devote a little attention to them.

Probably no one book has made more converts to common sense and won more people away from superstition than Paine's "Age of Reason." It is a book, as Colonel Ingersoll says, that furnishes an immense amount of food for thought. It is written for the average mind, and is a straightforward, honest investigation of the Bible and of the Christian system. It has liberalized us all. It puts arguments in the mouths of the people; it puts the church on the defensiv; it enables somebody in every village to corner the parson. It has never been "answered" and never can be.

What ought to be done, and what we propose to do, is to scatter this book broadcast—to giv and to hav given away thousands of them among the people. Every church-member that any Freethinker knows ought to hav one. It will do that church-member good, even if his wife burns it. He will read a few pages in it at least before she gets hold of it. But perhaps she too will read it. That book in a family is bound to do good—an immense amount. It has liberalized thousands and will liberalize thousands more. That book started THE TRUTH SEEKER, for from reading it D. M. Bennett, whom we all loved when living, and whose memory we now honor, became a Liberal. Previously he was a rigid churchman. There are more like him in the country, and it is they we ought to reach.

Our proposition is for every reader of this paper to send us the names and addresses of EIGHT of his Christian acquaintances and ONE DOLLAR, and we will mail each of them a copy of Paine's "AGE OF REASON."

If you don't know eight Christians you care enough about to convert, name those whom you do want to convert, send the dollar, and we will mail the remainder to some editor or public man or preacher worth saving.

In this way public opinion can be made and the church undermined. A few Freethinkers in a community can club together and convert a whole congregation, leaving the minister high and dry in his pulpit. Or they can send us the funds and we will make the selection of the target and take the responsibility of the work. What we want is to scatter the book among the people and hav it read

Remember, we do all the work—all we ask is the names and addresses and means to mail the book. Surely everybody can help in this and make thousands of Freethinkers. Don't select the names of indifferentists, but those of good church people, with a preference for those who hav the capacity to think if they only are steered in the right direction.

Never commence to pray for rain until the wind has changed to the right quarter, and then only in the presence of ignorant and very religious audiences.

Cordial Reception of the "Missionary Scheme."

Our offer of eight copies of the "Age of Reason" for $1, to be mailed, postage paid by us, to the addresses of Christians, is bringing in numerous responses. It is evident that our readers see the value of such a means of liberalizing the minds of church members.

Here are a few of the letters received in the last few days:

"PARIS, TEX., July 8, 1894.

"MR. EDITOR: In your last paper I notice an offer to send eight copies of Thomas Paine's 'Age of Reason' for $1 to religious friends. I hand you the dollar and names.

"If it is not asking too much I should like for you to send sample copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER to each of the above named persons, and oblige, J. F. MILES."

"PLYMOUTH, PA., July 8, 1894.

"MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1, for which send the 'Age of Reason' to the addresses given.

"L. K. DERBY."

"July 8, 1894.

"MR. EDITOR: I noticed that in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 7th you struck the best plan of saving some sensible souls. I mean through Paine's 'Age of Reason.' I inclose $2; $1 to be the price of eight souls whose names and addresses accompany this, and if their respectiv souls are not worth twelve and a half cents apiece, I spend my money very foolishly, for I picked out the very best I knew. A WORKER."

"GREENVILLE, N. C., July 9, 1894.

"MR. EDITOR: I see in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 7th an offer to mail eight copies of the 'Age of Reason' to eight names of Christians. Inclosed find $1, for which please mail one copy to each of the appended addresses.

"WM. H. LONG."

We can think of no better way of reaching thoughtful Christians than this which is so quickly appealing to the good sense and stimulating anew the zeal of our friends. We shall report progress again soon.

Judge Parker's Decision in the Moore Blasphemy Case.

The crime of blasphemy "must be considered a stranger to the laws of Kentucky." So said Judge Parker in sustaining the demurrer of C. C. Moore to the indictment for blasphemy. The opinion rendered by the Kentucky judge is clear, concise, and wide-reaching. It is shown that blasphemy statutes are wholly out of place in a country where religious equality and freedom are guaranteed. In 1810 Chief Justice Kent, of the Supreme Court of New York, held that the common law against blasphemy was still in force, but he denied that Christianity is part of the law of the state, as is so confidently claimed by the Sundayites and other theocrats of our time. Judge Parker refuses to accept Justice Kent's dictum that we are bound by the common law inhibition of blasphemy, holding, and rightly, that that inhibition cannot be in force in a state which has no established religion. England had an established church; the tenets of that church constituted a part of the civil law and had to be enforced. Appealing to the authority of Blackstone, Judge Parker declares that "the sole aim and object of these [blasphemy, apostasy, and heresy] laws was to preserve the Christian faith, as it was then understood and accepted by the established church." He also says that "it was to uphold the established church, and not in any sense to maintain good order that there was a law against blasphemy." This is the only honest and sensible view to take of these statutes.

His analysis of the decision of Justice Kent, and the subsequent paragraphs of Judge Parker's opinion, tear to tatters the claim that because England had a state church whose dogmas became, by that fact, part of the laws of the kingdom, therefore, in the United States, which has no state church, Christianity is part of the laws of the nation and of the states. If Judge Parker's decision is sustained by the higher courts the death-blow has been given to the traitorous machinations of the theocrats. Heretofore court after court has held that Christianity has a place in our laws, and all this inexcusable legal blundering has had its source in the false view that we must be guided by the English common law, in spite of the fact that it is absolutely unsuited, as regards "religious offenses," to our wholly dissimilar conditions. We ask every reader to thoroughly familiarize himself or herself with the position and arguments of Judge Parker. The decision will be found in full on page 456.

J. B. Wise, of Clay Center, Kansas, indicted, as told in these columns, by a federal grand jury, for sending by mail a passage from the Bible, has been released on bail. He will be tried in October if the attorneys at work on the case do not succeed in squelching the prosecution.

The most unexpected and painful news of the sudden death of Charles W. Goff has reached us. He died of heart disease at his home in Kearney, Nebraska, on June 23d. In our next issue we shall giv the addresses delivered at his funeral by Almon Stuart, of Minden, and Hon. E. C. Calkins, of Kearney.

A number of our doubly-afflicted fellow-citizens sailed last week on a pilgrimage to Lourdes. Sixty-seven went on the "Noordland" and one hundred and twenty on the "Paris." It is probable that the sea voyage and the excitement, change of climate, scenery, etc., in France will relieve some of them of their physical infirmities, but there does not appear to be even the shadow of a hope that the tenacious grip of the faith disease will be weakened in a single instance. They come from different sections of the country, and among them are some afflicted with paralysis while many others are suffering from eye trouble. "They all expect," says the Times, "to be miraculously cured at the grotto." It is pathetic.

The Freethought Letter-Writing Corps (except the New York section) will write again this week to Representativs concerning the Vilas bill for the prevention of commerce. This bill was quoted in full in these columns last week. It is intended by this measure to apply the same censorship to literature forwarded by express that the Comstock statutes enforce against that sent by mail, with this difference, that the incorporation of the word "indecent" in the new law is meant to suppress what Christians cannot forbid circulation on the worn-out charge of "blasphemy" and which is not amenable to the accusation of "obscenity." Under such a drag-net statute a Christian jury would hav no difficulty in condemning any Freethought book or paper, while the best works on sexual physiology would be remorselessly interdicted. This reactionary scheme must be defeated. Address a new Representativ this week.

Now that the strike is apparently over and business about to resume its wonted course, we expect to receive a larger number of orders for "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." Mr. Putnam is at work in the Northwest, and, although it is the lecturer's dull season of the year, and made more than ordinarily unprofitable by the industrial disturbances, he is not cast down as those whose only ambition is the accumulation of wealth might easily suppose him to be. Yet it will be a good idea to help us prepare a number of cheering messages to be sent to him during the next few weeks. THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year (old and new subscribers) and "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" still go for $6.50, with your name enrolled in the memorial volume. These names received since last acknowledgment:

British Columbia.—Simeon Duck.
Colorado.—A. E. Beebe.
Massachusetts.—Alfred Larson.
Washington.—Michel Steffan.

The Christian Statesman, in its overweening self-confidence, sneers at the remark of a city official that certain admitted evils are perplexing problems and that the authorities are in doubt as to how to deal with them. It is sure that all that needs to be done is to enforce the laws, and it asks why the suppression of the crimes of burglary and murder is not also a "perplexing problem." It is, but not in the sense that the suppression of vice is such. There is a vital distinction between vice and crime, despite the oftentimes close association of the two, and no really serious student of social questions can make light of the doubts and difficulties of those who are charged with the enforcement of our statutes and ordinances against private weaknesses. Most of these enactments are crude, ill-considered, undiscriminating, cruel in operation and disastrous in effect. They serve no good purpose and aggravate the evils at which they are ostensibly aimed. For once the officials are wiser than the moralists, although the laws which the latter insist on having enable the former to make merchandise of the misfortunes of some classes while doing absolutely nothing to inaugurate better conditions.

Even so fair and progressiv a paper as the Boston Transcript, a journal which spoke often, ably, and manfully for the opening of the Fair gates on Sunday, is not entirely free from the influence of the holy day superstition. Sometime ago it said:

The political campaign in Massachusetts for the fall election in 1894 began yesterday, when the Socialist Labor party held its fourth annual convention of a Sunday in the good, clean, representativ New England city of Springfield, and nominated candidates for governor and a general state ticket. In choosing Sunday for their convention day, the Socialist Labor men manifest their un-American promptings and tendencies. It is doubtful if it will help them in securing the votes of the men of Massachusetts who hav been in the habit of looking upon Sunday with some degree of habitual respect, even when the old-fashioned Sabbath-keeping piety is no longer felt.

Why should not political conventions be held on Sunday? The majority of the delegates are on that day released from their ordinary duties and the convention work will be an agreeable change. This is particularly true of parties largely composed of wage-earners, whose delegates cannot well afford to lose the earnings they would hav to sacrifice otherwise. The elector who would cast his ballot against the candidates of the party whose principles he believes are true, just, and expedient, merely because its nominating convention was held on a particular day of the week instead of some other, must be a very imperfect specimen of manhood. Either his intellect sadly needs cultivating or his moral nature is out of plumb. Has Massachusetts many such citizens? The epithet "un-American" is unworthy of the cultured and generally cosmopolitan Transcript.

It depends very much upon your environment whether your creed name is one of shame or of honor. Paul Marc Sauvalle is editor of La Patrie, Montreal. T. P. Tardival is editor of La Verite, Quebec. Mr. Sauvalle is an old-country Frenchman, a Catholic, at least professedly, but his wife belongs to the Eglise Reformee of France, and his children are Protestants. These facts hav placed his orthodoxy under suspicion. La Verite accused him of being a Methodist. This was too much. He felt that his reputation was damaged to the extent of just $200. He sued to recover this amount from Mr. Tardival. Rev. Canon Archambault, "doctor of ecclesiastical law and chancellor for the archdiocese," testified for Mr. Sauvalle. He said that a man did not cease to be a Catholic unless he formally declared his intention of leaving the church. (The membership lists of many churches, Protestant and Catholic alike, are kept fat in that way.) The Catholic church, continued Canon Archambault, in cases of mixed marriages, ordered that the children be brought up as Catholics, but if these orders were disobeyed the disobedience was not sufficient to justify the accusation of not being a Catholic. The counsel argued that to a man in Mr. Sauvalle's situation the name "Methodist" was as offensiv as the term "Jesuit" would be in France. Judge Jette gave a decision for Sauvalle in the full amount demanded, $200. He said that the term "Methodist" applied to a Catholic in a Catholic province must be injurious. The moral of this is that it is libel to call a man something that he is not, especially in a neighborhood where the ideas designated by that appellation are at a discount. Nevertheless the gentleman who happens to be meant should not get excited too quickly. In Florence, state of Iowa, away back in the first days of the war, "a bad man from the East" pulled off his coat and whipped an Irishman for calling him a "black Republican." In less than a year it was not safe in that township to be suspected of being anything else. Times change and men with them. "Christian" was once a term of honor and "Infidel" an opprobrious epithet. We liv in a transition period.

Stephen Girard.

BY J. C. HANNON.

[An address delivered before the Friendship Liberal League, Philadelphia, May 20, 1894.]

II.

Though born in France, Girard was proud of his American citizenship, and never lost an opportunity to show his attachment to republican institutions. During the war of 1812 he upheld the financial arm of the government by maintaining the credit of the United States Bank. When our national credit was prostrated by fear of the dissolution of the union; when our resources were exhausted to the last cent; when the cry of treason and disunion was heard coincident with the invasion of an English fleet; when in vain the government called for a loan of $5,000,000, and by every inducement failed to raise over $25,000—in such a crisis and under such appalling circumstances, Stephen Girard stepped to the front, cool as a philosopher, undismayed by present emergencies and without thought of future compensation, and subscribed the full amount of $5,000,000. When we consider the circumstances, remembering that an internal conspiracy of great magnitude was aiming to cripple our national defense; that an English fleet was destroying our commerce on the sea; that financial speculators sat like buzzards on the fences of expectation waiting to devour the carcass of the American Union; that Girard's chances of reimbursement were less hopeful than those of one who stakes his fortune on the capital prize of the Louisiana lottery—who will deny that his patriotism in those times that tried men's souls places his name on our muster roll of patriots?

It has been asserted that his motiv was gain, not philanthropy. This I deny as a pious lie invented by those who hoped to harvest from the products of his industry. While there is nothing in the mere accumulation of wealth to command our veneration or esteem, Girard stands as a noble exception to the crowd of dollar snatchers whose paths are marked by poverty, wretchedness, and ruin. It was not the acquisition of power that stimulated him. His democratic spirit subdued the baser passions that govern our modern Christian millionaires, and fitted him to become the bulwark of society, the benefactor of posterity, and the father of countless orphans yet unborn. Denied the benefits of a refined education, still his penetrating vision beheld the hopeless condition of thousands consigned to lives of poverty and ignorance. His powers of mind responded to the vastness of the responsibility attending the possession of wealth, and he resolved to confer on future generations the benefits of the riches he had acquired. This fact is borne out by the laudable hope he expressed when he said:

> My deeds shall be my life. My actions shall speak to future generations of the only claim I hav upon their respect and attention.

The tenor of his will bears out his truthful assertion, and his magnificent college, with its endowment of millions upon millions, dedicated to the causes of education, sobriety, morality, and patriotism, proclaims him one of the great family of immortals whose footsteps will re-echo down the corridors of ages.

Numerous anecdotes are related of his eccentricities, but they are familiar to every one who has read anything of his life. There are two especial events, however, that show the trend of his mind when excited by conflicting emotions. His munificent liberality to charitable institutions was a matter of every-day notoriety. He had a special attachment for the Penn Hospital, and his liberal donations hav undoubtedly placed that grand old institution among the permanent landmarks of the city. Mr. Girard had many personal friends, but none who knew him better than Samuel Coates, a liberal Quaker and patron of the hospital. One day Mr. Coates called on Girard for a donation. The latter was at dinner. Mr. Coates took a seat at the same table, and came at once to business. "Well," said Girard, "how much do you want now?" "Anything thee pleases," said Mr. Coates. Girard arose, went to his desk, and wrote and presented a check for $2,000, which the Quaker placed in his pocket, not even looking at the figures. "What," said Girard, "you do not look at the check?" "Beggars must not be choosers," said Mr. Coates. "Then, hand me back the check," said Girard. "No, no!" answered Mr. Coates, "a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush." "Well," responded Girard, "you hav caught me on the right footing to-day." He then drew up another for $5,000, and handed it to Mr. Coates, saying, "Will you look at this?" "Well, if it pleases thee," said his friend, which he did, and handed back the first one. This little incident is characteristic of both men, and showed that they understood each other thoroughly.

On a subsequent occasion, a Baptist minister named Stoughton, who evidently had heard of the incident just related, called on Girard for a donation to build a church. Girard received the dominie with cold and formal courtesy. Surmising the object of his visit, he presented him a check for $500. After noting the amount, the clergyman knit his brows, and exclaimed: "Only $500! surely you will make it $1,000." "Let me hav the check," said Girard, "I will rectify it." The preacher rubbed his hands in expectation as he handed back the check, but Girard tore it into fragments and, pointing to the door, said, "You had your choice of $500 or nothing; now take it and go."

I will not dwell upon his private life, nor do we claim that he possessed either literary or scientific attainments. Whatever stock of useful knowledge he possessed was acquired by the nativ vigor of his intellect. His favorite authors were Voltaire, Hume, Gibbon, Rousseau and Thomas Paine, whose genius and philosophy he admired, whose noble sentiments found congenial abode in his bosom, and whose works were always conspicuous in his small and choice library (which library has been consigned to the dark corner of the college cellar, together with two elegant marble busts of Voltaire and Rousseau that, so long as he lived, adorned his private sitting room on Water street).

Girard's Will is a masterpiece of benevolent calculation, and every Freethinker should own a copy, as it givs the lie to the blatant hypocrits who ask, "What hav Infidels done for the world—what charities hav they fostered, what colleges hav they raised?" The college at present contains sixteen hundred boys, thus disproving Daniel Webster's prophecy, which was, "There is no Christian parent who, if called on to die, would not rather trust his orphan children to the cold charity of the world, than trust them to an institution where their education and physical comfort were abundantly attended to, but away from the hopes and consolations of the Christian religion." The following is Girard's especial clause in that remarkable will, and it is printed on the face of all visitors' permits:

> I enjoin and require, that no ecclesiastical missionary or minister of any denomination shall ever hold or exercise any duty or station in said college; nor shall any such person ever be admitted even as a visitor within its premises.

Imagin the sublime audacity of erecting with his money a church on the premises he dedicated to the education of orphans and polluting the minds of children with the sophistries of exploded superstition. Striking features of the modern buildings on the college grounds are the phallic emblems used in their architecture, in glaring contrast to the Grecian sculpture of the main building. In fact, a stranger would suppose the whole institution was an extensiv theological seminary.

Though the schemes of the pious directors are marked by evasions, their designs hav been detected, and I hope the day is not far distant when the common instincts of justice to Girard's memory will inspire the citizens of his adopted city to demand a complete and unequivocal explanation. Though the defenders of superstition hav been the defamers of his character and hav violated the noblest wishes of his life, the Christian church can search in vain through the calendar of her saints for such a noble, generous, and heroic soul. She may sneer and scoff at his homely and democratic instincts, but deep in her soul she envies his greatness, and would willingly exchange ten millions of her blockheads for one such character as Stephen Girard.

Woman's suffrage seems likely to be obtained. When it is a reality the ladies will tone down and abandon hysterics, especially the Christian form of that disorder. They are badly in its grip at present. Miss Frances Willard, for instance, referring to Sir John Hall, ex-premier of New Zealand, where woman's suffrage obtains, said that "it took two thousand years of Christian life to produce such a man." She did not say how many years of Christian life it took to produce John Ballance and Sir Robert Stout, both premiers of New Zealand, and both Secularists. Nor did she say how many years of Christian life it took to produce John Stuart Mill, who wrote his book on "The Subjection of Women" when the cause was laughed at. Christians talk as though great causes began when they took them up, whereas they never take them up until they are winning.—London Freethinker.

Freethought and Secular Notes from England.

CHRISTIANITY A FAILURE.

The Church Missionary Society has been recently distributing pious tracts rather extensivly in London. One of those tracts given away the other Sunday in Westminster Abbey has reached me and this is what it says:

> The work of converting the heathen is only beginning, and we hav barely touched the fringe of it. The natural increase of population in the heathen world is outstripping at this moment all our efforts; and if it is true, and I believe it has never been contradicted, that four millions only hav been baptized within this century, it has also been said without contradiction that the natural increase of the heathen world in that time has been two hundred millions, an awful contemplation for us to-night. It is said that there are eight hundred millions on our earth to whom the name of Jesus Christ is unknown, and that ten hundred and thirty millions are not in any sense Christianized. Of these, thirty-five millions pass annually in one ghastly, reproachful, mournful procession into Christless graves. They are dying so very fast! In China alone, taking the lowest computation of the population which has been given, it is estimated that fourteen hundred die every hour, and that in this one day thirty-three thousand Chinese hav passed beyond our reach. And if this meeting were to agree to send a missionary to-morrow to China, before he could reach Chinese shores one and a half millions of souls would hav passed from this world into eternity. Nineteen centuries hav passed away, and only one-third of the population of our earth is even nominally Christian. We are bound to face these facts and all that they mean for us to-night, and to ask ourselvs how we stand in regard to this awful need of the heathen world.

The meaning is clear. The gospel has failed, and therefore a sensible remedy (if any) should be applied. In reading this tract one is reminded of St. Theresa's famous vision, in which souls were dropping into hell like flakes in a snowstorm.

RELIGIOUS BIGOTRY AGAIN.

The indignation of the public has been justly aroused through the recent action of the Rev. James Drew, vicar of Wapleywith, Codrington, and through the position he has taken up in wantonly insulting a number of residents in his parish. Some of his parishioners, who belong to the Baptist communion, hav recently erected a mission room in that village, and by this exercise of their undoubted right hav offended and irritated the reverend gentleman. He has issued a remarkable circular, in which he compares the action of his Baptist neighbors to the sin of Jeroboam, who made Israel to sin, in that he set up places of worship other than that place which God had chosen in Jerusalem. He further supports his sentence of denunciation by extracts from the writings of Calvin, Baxter, and John Wesley. The Rev. James Drew is evidently unable to read the signs of the times if he thinks that by such means he can either commend his church to acceptance or win respect of right-minded citizens. This is another instance showing how Christians love one another.

THEOLOGICAL TRICKERY.

As I hav already intimated to your readers some weeks ago, 3,130 London board school teachers informed the board that they could not conscientiously impart religious instruction in the spirit of the notorious circular, thus accepting the board's offer that in that case they should be relieved from the duty. Instead of carrying out the offer, the school management committee now ask the board to empower them to write to these 3,130 teachers individually, and ask them to say over again what they said in the memorial. The object of this proceeding is the moral intimidation of the teachers who took the board at its word and claimed relief on the very terms it proposed. The fact is that the board cannot afford to dispense with the services of more than 3,000 teachers, and so it is trying to frighten them into compliance.

THE PARSON'S LOVE FOR THE LABORER.

The Rev. F. S. Hewson is vicar of Compton, Verney, and he is also a member of the board of guardians. In this capacity, in his own words, he "tries to do his duty to the rate-payers as well as to the poor." What he conceives to be his duty to the poor may be judged from the following incident: A Strafford-on-Avon woman's husband was removed to the lunatic asylum. She had three children and after paying rent and club subscription there was left three shillings nine pence a week to maintain herself and her children, and she applied to the guardians for relief. It was proposed to allow her three shillings a week, but the Rev. F. S. Hewson protested against this and said he did not think it was a case for relief. One guardian very properly exclaimed that it was disgraceful to hear a clergyman maintain that three shillings nine pence was sufficient for four people to liv upon, whereupon another guardian got up and regretted that members of the board should allow the devil to get the better of them in their discussions. If it was the devil who inspired the indignation against the parson all we can say is that the devil is very far from being as bad as he is supposed to be. And how the Rev. F. S. Hewson must be beloved by his parishioners!

THE CHURCH STOPS THE WAY.

The London Echo says that the truth must be told, whoever may be offended. The church stops the way in London board schools, in promoting endless and profitless discussions on the necessity of dogma-teaching in the schools, and it stops the way in the House of Lords by obstinately rejecting the Marriage with the Deceased Wife's Sister bill. This bill has been passed by the House of Commons again and again. "A fig for the House of Commons, or the opinion of the country," say the bishops. On June 14th the bill was once more rejected in the House of Lords by a majority of nine, the whole of the bishops voting against the bill. We are glad to see the present agitation going on throughout the country for an extensiv reform of the Upper House. Whatever other improvements may take place, we hope the bishops will be sent from a place where they hav neither the ability nor desire to be of any service to the democratic aspirations of the present age.

AN IMPROVED CHRISTIANITY.

The dean of Ely has been following the example of other church worthies in endeavoring to improve Christianity. This eminent divine a few days since preached a special sermon in Shoreditch church on the subject of "The Spiritual Basis of Education," in which he said that the theological doctrin of "original sin" was not true, and that the teaching of the "wrath of God" was an "appalling theory." "Paul says nothing about it." No such words, added the dean, are to be found in the Greek text. If this is so, the epistles of Paul, as found in the English New Testament, contain that which is positivly false, inasmuch as they undoubtedly teach both original sin and the wrath of God. (See Romans i, 18; v, 12; ix, 22; Ephesians v, 6) It is time that "God's" word was submitted to a still further process of improvement if we are to hav any idea of what the writers said and meant. Instead of believing that children are born in sin, the dean of Ely regards them as being the "children of emotion, of passion, governed by the things about them and the impression such things make upon their senses." This, no doubt, is a great improvement upon Christianity as taught by the churches and in portions of the Bible, but it shows how extensivly the Christian faith is being modified through the evolution of modern thought. Even the leading lights of the church are compelled to giv up the "faith as it was once delivered to the saints." Freethought is doing its work in heralding the advent of an era of mental freedom when superstition shall giv place to common sense, and theological faith shall yield to the lessons of cultivated reason.

REPEAL OF THE BLASPHEMY LAWS.

Legislation upon this subject has unfortunately received a check. The bill which was introduced into the House of Commons by Mr. Storey, M. P. for Sunderland, and which is almost identical with the one proposed by Mr. Bradlaugh in 1884, cannot pass its second reading this session in consequence of the pressure of business in the House of Commons. This is much to be regretted, for Mr. Storey's bill is of more importance to Secularists than appears upon the face of it. It would do more than secure free expression of opinion, it would also "legalize" heresy, by which bequests to the Secular party could be lawfully claimed in courts of law. Through the want of such rights as Mr. Storey's bill would obtain, the Freethought movement in this country has been greatly retarded. Again and again hav Christians robbed us of legacies and then taunted us with being too poor to make that headway which we should hav done but for the injustice and dishonesty perpetrated by the "servants of the Lord" The National Secular Society is taking steps to hav the bill again brought forward in the House of Commons next session.

A FREE SUNDAY.

The work of the "Lord's Day Observance Society" in endeavoring to stop Sunday music at Leeds has up to the present been confined to threats. These over-pious intruders upon the rights of others bark loudly, but they are slow in attempting to bite. Their latest folly is in condemning the sale of newspapers and refreshments on Sundays at Newcastle. It is expected, however, that their crusade against a free Sunday will end in "sound and fury, signifying nothing" but Sabbatarian stupidity. The Sunday Society has just held its annual meeting, when a most encouraging report of progress during the last twelve months was read. Mr. W. Holman Hunt, the eminent artist, was elected president for the current year. In his opening address he made a strong appeal for a free Sunday. Although a professed Christian, he had no sympathy with those believers who sought to fetter the liberty of any members of society by what he called "harassing persecution." He held that "the death-knell of such social exclusivness had been sounded."

INTERESTING EVENTS.

The pious people of Scotland are much concerned over a book that has just been published, written by William Macintosh, M.A., D D., and which is commanding a rapid sale. The reverend doctor dismisses the doctrins of the supernatural birth of Jesus, of miracles, and of the atonement as being no part of Christianity. The last doctrin, he says, was the "invention of St. Paul." Speaking of Jesus, the writer remarks: "We say that he was a man and nothing but a man." This is not bad for orthodox Scotland. Heresy is evidently marching on even north of the Tweed.

The tables are turned upon certain Christians with a vengeance. Hitherto it has been supposed that the "second coming" of Christ was an event still in the future. But Mr. Hampden Cook, M.A, B.A., has issued a book entitled "The Christ Has Come." He alleges that after the destruction of Jerusalem Jesus personally returned, sitting in the clouds about A.D. 70. He remained "with us" but a short time, and when he departed he took with him to heaven two of his disciples who had remained faithful. Fancy two faithful followers of the God-man in the year 70. It would be difficult to find even that number to-day.

The Paine Memorial Number of THE TRUTH SEEKER has been read here with much pleasure. Several of my friends in the north of England signified their intention of subscribing for this excellent journal. If the Editor would send me a parcel of TRUTH SEEKERS to giv away as sample copies I would see that good use was made of them. Many inquiries are also being made as to when friend Putnam's great work, "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," will reach this country. I hope to find that the book will hav an extensiv sale on this side of the Atlantic. The author has bestowed sufficient time and labor upon his work to make it one of the most valuable productions of modern times. Many of us are impatient to revel in the rich fields of intellectual treasure that Mr. Putnam has secured for us.

CHARLES WATTS.

London, June 27, 1894.

One Phase of the Hawaiian Question.

It seems rather singular that the inner history of what may be known in the future as "The Great Hawaiian Outrage" has not appeared in the daily press. But when one comes to consider that the church-Christian spirit animates quite generally the journalism of our day it is not so singular after all. When it becomes known that the troubles in the Hawaiian Islands for many years hav been the direct results of the efforts of the church-Christian missionary element to gain complete control of the government as well as the real estate of the nativs, the situation becomes greatly simplified.

The first church-Christian missionaries who visited the islands went there animated by fanatical zeal, with an honest desire, probably, to induce the nativs to accept church Christianity, or, as the missionaries called it, to "save their souls." They found the nativs kind, hospitable, generous, and unsophisticated. They took readily to rum and the vices that follow in the train of missionary work of this sort, and not having the hardy Anglo-Saxon constitution, the nativ population was rapidly reduced, until now it amounts to a mere handful of not very admirable people. In the mean time the missionary band, increased numerically, began to acquire real estate and to work its relativs into the commerce of the country. When the Gibson government collapsed a few years ago it was shown that all the desirable property in Honolulu was in the hands of the missionaries and their descendants. It was only a question of a very short time when the missionary contingent would take entire possession of the islands and leave the nativ remnant to drink itself to death.

The whole record of the missionary occupation of the Hawaiian Islands is shameful to the last degree, and ought to cause every honest American to blush for the share our country has had in it. It is simply a repetition of the British occupation of the East and the Spanish seizure of the Philippine islands. Backed by powerful armies and navies, church-Christian missionaries worm themselvs into the confidence of the unsuspecting nativs, and then the tide of "civilization" is turned toward the unhappy land. Nativ Hawaiians hav seen their fair islands ruthlessly, remorselessly seized by church-Christian missionary and church-Christian merchant, speculator, and adventurer, until they, the lawful owners, are forced to serve the invaders or starve. They see their sons and daughters rum soaked and debauched, and vice, crime, degradation, and misery spread broadcast among their squalid homes. But the invaders—where are they? Living in lavish luxury and pomp six days of the week, and singing gospel hymns on the seventh. They roll through the well-paved streets in elegant carriages driven by "converted" nativs, while other "converted" nativs fill the offices of cooks and waiters and laborers, and toil and toil and toil, year in and year out, that these delicately-nurtured church Christians may enjoy the sweets of life to the fullest extent. Is this picture overdrawn? Ask any honest, observant man who has lived in the East and has seen the half-naked nativ wearily toiling to benefit the white church Christian who has robbed him of his right to the land on which he livs.—Condensed from the Moslem World.

Churchly Purpose and Performance.

When Mr. S. Standring was lecturing recently at New Cross, England, a charge was made on the platform by a party of Christians He was speaking for a labor society and the Christians could not endure the fact that he was a Secularist and Atheist. In connection with this the Freethinker says: "One of our readers and his wife were present at this meeting, and were defending Secularism against the filthy lies of certain tract distributors, when a Christian lady asked what they would substitute for the Bible? 'Common sense,' replied the lady Secularist: whereupon the gospel-fed dame said, 'You ought to be burnt.' And when the Secularist rejoined, 'No doubt you would like to burn me,' the sweet Christian answered, 'I would.' The emphasis and expression of this female follower of the meek and lowly Jesus were a beautiful illustration of the glorious gospel of love." ∴∴ The Roman Catholic clergy of Paris are doing a grand business. The Lazarists hav in France and her colonies 19 great and 10 small seminaries, besides 68 missions in foreign countries. The foreign missionaries hav 24 missions established. The monk manufactory at Saint Sulpice controls 23 seminaries. The Christian School Brothers, numbering 9,819 members, direct 1,449 schools, of which 1,064 are public and 385 private schools. Besides those societies above named there are numerous others, which, however, lead a poor existence. The Philanthropic Society, another clerical (nun) institution, has 32 free restaurants, from which it annually distributes 2,500,000 meals, 28 medical dispensaries in which there were last year treated free of charge 8,000 children and 2,000 grown persons, and 44,400 consultations were held. During 1893 it distributed garments to 12,000 women and 2,000 children, and placed in "Christian" homes 3,800 persons The money for this gigantic institution comes by popular subscription, but the church takes the credit. Last year the Paris municipality refused it a grant of 3,000 fr., which formerly had been given it, on the ground that church and state are and should be separate. All the above-named and various other societies which continually call attention to their extreme poverty, possessed in 1880 property worth 711,000.000 fr., eleven times the amount owned by them in 1849, while at the present time their property is valued at 3,000,000,000 fr. ∴∴ In the February number of the Danish scientific magazine, Nature and Man, Dr. Chr. Geill has a very instructiv article on "Religious Feeling and Insanity." From this article we reproduce the following figures: In the state asylum at Aarhuus there hav entered during the last fifteen years, 1,767 patients (876 men and 891 women); of these 30 men and 59 women became deranged through religious influence. Considering the small area from which the asylum receives its patients, and that it is a well known fact that many outside the asylum commit suicide, and that a still greater number is kept at home, five per cent is a terribly high figure to be debited to one cause. Prayer meetings (that is, the home mission work) are responsible for 60 patients, 35 during the last nine years. The statistics as to former surroundings and education of the unfortunates reveal that they are almost entirely recruited among the poor and most ignorant. ∴∴ A Belgian Freethinker, Leon Fabry, died at Willebroeck. In his will he called for a secular funeral. His mother is a Christian. The mayor, knowing this, prohibited secular ceremonies, and placed police at the door to prevent the Freethinkers from complying with their late friend's wish. A religious funeral took place under police protection. A formal complaint has been sent to the minister of the interior and to the Belgian House of Commons. ∴∴ Dr. Bruno Wille was prosecuted by the orthodox German school officials and sentenced to pay a fine of 800 marks. He has appealed to the minister of church and education, and all members of the Reichstag hav been publicly urged to investigate the official prosecution. ∴∴ Although secular funerals are quite common in the larger cities of Spain, they are scarce in smaller places, hence every now and then a priest and his people make themselvs notorious by interfering with secular funerals, when such occur. The last instance, which comes to us from private source, mentions that at Sestao, when the funeral of the Freethinker Campello was well under way, the remains to be lowered in the grave, a representativ of God arrived with a crucifix, and backed by several hundred hard fists belonging to his congregation, he prohibited the funeral. Result, a free-for-all fight, which necessitated the interference of a strong police force, which arrested several of the combatants, taking care, however, to miss the priest.

News and Notes.

The Fourth of July was celebrated with great éclat at Creston, Ia. Early in the morning the crowds flocked in from the neighboring country—men, women, and children—in all sorts of vehicles, glittering with flags, accompanied with the continuous exploitation of firecrackers. It was a glorious day, one of the most glorious I hav ever witnessed. It rained the day before, enough to spoil my lecture at Orient, but it cleared the atmosphere wonderfully, and earth and sky presented a brilliant appearance. A vast procession was formed, the militia and the Grand Army in the ranks, with beautifully decorated wagons picturing the arts and industries, little children in gorgeous costumes representing the states, while the drum corps and the brass band poured forth the patriotic strains, and all kept step to the "music of the Union." Immense crowds thronged the line of march and welcomed the pageantry with clapping of hands and thunderous cheers. It was a scene to bring back the happy days of youth, when all the world was like a garden of flowers and life's pathway ascended to the golden hights of hope. In the experiences of age we are apt to forget the bloom and glory of visionary childhood and see only the stern realities without the entrancing light of poetry. These gala days are of service to mankind, for they kindle heart and hope amid toil and anxious thought. They bring people together, and the spirit of humanity shines in ten thousand faces, and the grandeur of our common existence is realized. Let us not say that the Fourth of July represents nothing, though its noise and parade are not in harmony with philosophic culture. It does mean a great deal to the reflecting mind, for beneath its superficial attractions and distractions there is a great tide of human advancement, there is a supreme and luminous idea in what philosophy must find its noblest fruition. So let us keep these holidays which spring from the development of human affairs—which do not exist in praise of the gods, but of man.

I had the honor on this occasion to giv the opening address to this great concourse of people, as to the meaning of the "Star-Spangled Banner," which we all love whatever may be the imperfections of our government. It means unity, liberty, labor, education, peace, and progress, and these shall some day triumph in the glorious future of humanity. I was followed by Hon. J. W. Sullivan, a Catholic, and Senator Harsh, a Universalist I understand, and so, with the Infidel, this made a very Liberal representation. The invocation was given by Rev. Mr. Powell, of the Baptist persuasion, who invited me to dinner, and so we broke bread together beneath the red, white, and blue. Altogether it was a very genial gathering, and it was an evidence of the harmony which will exist when all creeds hav become a thing of the past.

In the evening Mr. F. I. Green and myself journeyed to Cromwell, six miles away, to the fireside of Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Geier, which had the familiar look of several years ago, when I visited and lectured in the vicinity. An agreeable evening was passed in this Freethought home—the children and the dog contributing to the fireworks of the occasion, and the older folks the ice cream, "high-five," and other hilarities. So this Fourth of July of 1894 is a varied and delightful memory. Miss Minnie Geier, daughter of our friends, is now married, and I was glad to greet at our meetings Mr. and Mrs. Moore, both Liberals.

Nevinville is a small place, but one of the oldest towns in this part of Iowa, which has been settled mainly during the last twenty five years. No Freethought lecture had ever been given in Nevinville. There are two churches in the place, and outwardly it is quite orthodox. The lectures turned out to be a success. The school-house was crowded both evenings. So far as I could judge my radical utterances were well received, and I hav no doubt that advanced ideas will hav a fruitful reception in this community. Our representativs are all that could be wished in character and cultivation. Mrs. Almeda Green for over half a century has been an outspoken Freethinker, and her children and grandchildren bear on the stream of intellectual liberty. F. I. Green, her son, my stanch comrade through this campaign of varied fortunes, takes upon himself the whole expense of the work; and literally he abored night and day for the success of the enterprise. Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Truman and Miss Caroine A. Truman, their daughter and the granddaughter of Mrs. Green, were especially devoted to the movement. Miss Truman has taught school for several terms with great approval even by Christian parents, but she has never concealed her Freethought convictions, and teaches according to purely secular principles—no Bible and no prayers.

I had the pleasure of visiting Mr. and Mrs. R. W. Johnson of Orient, who are true-blue Liberals, originally of the Methodist church, but through THE TRUTH SEEKER, now of the "big church; Mr. J. W. Johnson, their son, Mrs. Garmon and Mrs. Witham, their daughters, and their families are also on this roll. Mr. and Mrs. Kunath, who were here at my lectures six years ago, now of Oregon, are ready to be counted with the pioneers. I failed to do anything at Orient or at Creston outside of the Fourth of July oration. It is astonishing what indifference there is, but the churches seem to be dead also. A lady revivalist preached a whole week at Nevinville and did not make a single convert. The people are in a free-and-easy sort of condition, and think more of a crop of corn, and fat cattle and hogs, than of most anything else. We can only hope that evolution and science will some day interest these people in progressiv ideas. However, it has been encouraging to meet with a few generous supporters who are not daunted by opposition and will stay by the flag be it defeat or triumph. I must mention on this roll Mr. D. E. Levens, of Creston, who did all he could to arrange for lectures at Creston, but the "fates" were against us this time, and all the eloquence and wisdom in the world would not hav availed. There are quite a number of Liberals here, but for some reason they won't show their colors. However, we shall try again if the opportunity occurs.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Eighteenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union.

On the evening of July 7th a meeting of the board of directors of the American Secular Union was held at the residence of Dr. Juliet H. Severance. The members present were: President C. B. Waite, Dr. Severance, Dr. G. A. F. de Lespinasse, Dr. Joseph H. Greer, E. P. Peacock, vice-president for the state of Illinois, acting as proxy for Otto Wettstein, who had attended the previous meeting, but could not be present at this one, and Mrs. M. A. Freeman. The time and place of holding the annual congress was considered and the secretary instructed to write to the Freethought publications that the desire of Liberals may be learned. So far the majority of those expressing an opinion on the subject hav been in favor of Chicago, but if there is any society which would defray the expenses of the congress or some considerable portion of the expenses, the board would favor it being given an opportunity to do this. If not it would seem a necessity that the convention be held in Chicago. Liberals are requested to write to the secretary at once, giving expression to their preference as to locality. There is none too much time.

T. B. Wakeman, of New York, a vice-president of the American Secular Union, in a recent letter to the board urges the necessity of organization. Several strong unions hav been for such during the past year, but the number seems discouragingly small when it is remembered how numerous are the societies whose specific object is to oppose the secularization of the state. Again, these Liberals are urged to organize auxiliaries to the American Secular Union. Send to the secretary for a charter.

It was voted by the board that Dr. de Lespinasse be appointed official representativ of the American Secular Union at the Freethought Congress to be held in Belgium in October. It was decided later that Otto Wettstein should also be elected as a delegate, and that Judge Waite furnish both of these gentlemen with the necessary credentials.

After the transaction of some unimportant business, the meeting adjourned to July 28th, by which time it is hoped that a wide expression of opinion will hav been given in regard to the holding of the eighteenth congress of the Amerioan Secular Union.

Blasphemy.

DECISION OF JUDGE PARKER IN THE CASE OF C. C. MOORE.

The defendant, C. C. Moore, is charged with having committed the offense of blasphemy. It is alleged in the indictment that the defendant, intending to treat with offensiv levity and ridicule the scriptural account of the divine conception and birth and to bring contempt against Almighty God and his divine purpose in causing the birth of Christ, did maliciously and blasphemously publish in a newspaper known as the Blue Grass Blade the following words:

"When I say that Jesus Christ was a man exactly like I am and had a human father and mother exactly like I had, some of the pious call it blasphemy. When they say that Jesus Christ was born as the result of a sort of Breckinridge-Pollard hyphenation between God and a Jew woman, I call it blasphemy, so you see there is a stand off."

It is further charged that, by this language, the defendant meant that pious and religious persons stated and believed that the birth of Jesus Christ was the result of an unholy and illicit connection between Almighty God and Mary, the mother of Christ.

To this indictment the defendant has filed a demurrer, and thereby made the claim that no offense against the laws of Kentucky had been charged against him. This demurrer having been argued with singular earnestness and ability by counsel both for the prosecution and the defense, and the question presented being a new one in this state, the court has given the case unusual consideration.

We hav no statute against blasphemy, and our Court of Appeals, so far as we know, has never passed upon this or any similar question. We must, therefore, in our investigations hav recourse to the common law and to the judicial decisions of other states and countries.

Blackstone, in treating of offenses against God and religion, speaks of this offense as "blasphemy against the Almighty by denying his being or providence or by contumelious reproaches of our Savior Christ." The punishment, he says, is by fine and imprisonment or other infamous corporal punishment. The ground upon which blasphemy is treated as an offense is that "Christianity is part of the laws of England." The leading case in this country in which the crime of blasphemy was discussed was that of the People vs. Ruggles, decided by the Supreme Court of New York in 1810, Chief Justice Kent delivering the opinion. In that case it was decided that the common law against blasphemy was still in force and a judgment to pay a fine of $500 and be imprisoned three months was affirmed. The court in this opinion cited with approval a number of English cases, in which the right to punish blasphemy had been vigorously upheld, and quoted the words of Lord Bacon, "profane scoffing doth by little and little deface the reverence for religion" and "two principal causes I hav and know of Atheism—curious controversies and profane scoffing." Whilst this opinion did not declare that Christianity was part of the law of the State of New York, but expressly disclaimed that there was an established religion in that state; yet the closeness with which it adhered to the definition of blasphemy as laid down by Blackstone, and the great reliance placed upon the English decisions, make us hesitate to walk in the path trod by Chief Justice Kent himself. For in England there was an established church. The church was part of the state. Apostasy and heresy were punished; the first commission of either offense disqualifying the offender for holding office, and the second being punished by three years' imprisonment without bail. Even witchcraft was claimed by Blackstone to be an offense against God and religion, and to deny the existence of such a crime, he said, was "at once to flatly contradict the revealed word of God," though he appeared to think it well that the punishment of this crime had fallen into disuse, as there had been no well authenticated modern instance of its commission.

In this country, where the divorce between church state is complete and final, we should examin with care and accept with caution any law framed and intended for a country where church and state are one. The difficulties in reconciling religious freedom with the right to punish for an offense against any given religion are manifest. From the opinion given in the People vs. Ruggles, we may deduce as conclusions of the court that the people generally in this country are Christians; that Christianity is engrafted upon the morality of the country; that all religions are tolerated, but that this toleration, as to false religions, means immunity from test oaths, disabilities, and the burdens of church establishments; that to revile the Christian religion is an offense, but that to revile other religions is not an offense punishable by law.

In the bill of rights in the Kentucky Constitution it is declared that all persons hav "the right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their consciences;" that "no preference shall be given by law to any religious sect, society, or denomination, nor to any particular system of ecclesiastical polity," and that "the civil rights, privileges, or capacities of no person shall be taken away or in anywise diminished or enlarged on account of his belief or disbelief of any religious tenet, dogma, or teaching."

It is difficult to conceive how language could be made plainer. If the framers of the constitution intended to place all religions on an exact equality before the law, they appear to hav employed language well calculated to express their purpose. They recognized the fact that men were religious, that they held different religious views, that some had no religious faith, and, granting the fullest religious freedom, they declared that the rights of none should be "diminished or enlarged on account of his belief or disbelief of any religious tenet, dogma, or teaching."

Under this constitution no form of religion can claim to be under the special guardianship of the law. The common law of England, whence our law of blasphemy is derived, did hav a certain religion under its guardianship, and this religion was part of the law. The greatest concession made to religious liberty was the right of learned persons to decently debate upon controverted points. The essence of the law against blasphemy was that the offense, like apostasy and heresy, was against religion, and it was to uphold the established church, and not in any sense to maintain good order, that there was a law against blasphemy. The most superficial examination of the chapter in Blackstone treating of offenses against God and religion, must convince any mind that the sole aim and object of these laws was to preserve the Christian faith, as it was then understood and accepted by the established church. It may seem to us that the punishments for these offenses were severe in the time of Blackstone, but they had then been greatly mitigated, as the stake and fagot had been of but too frequent use in propagating what was deemed to be the true religion. Even Blackstone complains that the definition of heresy had been too uncertain, and that the subject had been liable to be burnt for what he had not understood to be heresy until it was decided to be so by the ecclesiastical judge who interpreted the canonical scriptures. To deny any one of the persons of the trinity, or to allege that there were more gods than one, was a heresy and was punished in the same manner as apostasy.

Blasphemy is a crime grown from the same parent stem as apostasy and heresy. It is one of a class of offenses designed for the same general purpose, the fostering and protecting of a religion accepted by the state as the true religion, whose precepts and tenets it was thought all good subjects should observe. In the code of laws of a country enjoying absolute religious freedom there is no place for the common law crime of blasphemy. Unsuited to the spirit of the age, its enforcement would be in contravention of the constitution of this state, and this crime must be considered a stranger to the laws of Kentucky.

Wherefore it is adjudged that the demurrer be and it is hereby sustained, the indictment is dismissed, the defendant's bail bond is quashed, and the defendant is dismissed hence without day. To this ruling of the court the Commonwealth of Kentucky excepts, and prays an appeal to the Court of Appeals, which is granted.

What does the Catholic Review mean? Bemoaning the passage of the Hungarian Civil Marriage bill, it mentions the three other ecclesiastical bills which Premier Wekerle has prepared—a bill providing for the free exercise of worship, a measure regulating the religion of the offspring of mixed marriages, a bill guaranteeing equal religious rights to Jews and Christians—and adds: "The Masonic lodge is the power behind all three measures." This is equivalent to saying that these three embryo laws are infamous, for all know that the Catholic church looks upon continental Masonry as the embodiment of everything that is Antichristian, and therefore vile and destructiv. But is not the Review very incautious? Does it not, in and for the United States, believe in religious equality before the law? In freedom of worship? Why should not Premier Wekerle secure the adoption of a law protecting freedom of worship in Hungary? Why should liberty of religious services be such a good thing in America and such a bad thing in the Austrian empire? Evidently the Catholic Review does not believe that Jews should hav equal religious rights with Christians in the land of the Magyar. But we hav not heard that it protests against such equality in this republic. Are we to infer that the policy of the Catholic church is to demand freedom of conscience where she is relativly weak, and to deny it where she has the power to do so? We respectfully ask the Review to explain its position. It should not do again as it did when we corrected its mistake recently regarding the services of Paine in the Revolution—take refuge in silence.

"Thumbscrew and Rack," a pamphlet of Christian atrocities, by George E. Macdonald, the talented brother of the talented editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, should be in the hands of all who would like to know how it is that Christianity gained such an ascendancy in the world, and how it got ingrained into the very bones of the best nations in Europe till even the light of modern science and general intelligence stands appalled before it, or shrinks back not daring to come in conflict with it. Marking its deep-seated life which all but defies extirpation, the sciolist, who notes the phenomenon and cannot penetrate to the historical cause behind it, alleges that the reason of Christianity's power and endurance comes from God. Those who hav, however, read deeply in ecclesiastical history, know that its baleful strength lies in the fact that, wherever it may hav come from, it was propagated and enforced by all the most horrible machinery of hell. Surely, if the faith, as the simple believe, came from God, it did not require the devil to propagate and guard it! But that the cruelest and bloodiest resources of evil planted Christianity so deeply in this realm that all the efforts of modern enlightenment struggle in vain to quite uproot it, no one will doubt who reads this terrible pamphlet, like the decrees of Draco, written in blood. "I used to read in books," says Colonel Ingersoll, "how our fathers persecuted mankind. But I never appreciated it. I read it, but it did not burn itself into my soul. I did not really appreciate the infamies that hav been committed in the name of religion until I saw the iron arguments that Christians used." This little work givs engravings of the leading "iron arguments," as found in the Nuremberg collection. There is that persuasiv argument, the thumbscrew; there is "the plain rack," and what we suppose must be considered the ornamental one, adorned with the ghastliest of iron spikes. And, if these cannot persuade you to be an orthodox Christian, there are the leg-crusher, the stocks, "Damien's bed of steel," the iron boot, the wheel (two varieties), the spider, the chastity belt, and the iron virgin, possibly the only kind of virgin the church kept on her premises—all really telling arguments of the Holy Inquisition; and this harrowing pamphlet deals with the whole of them.—The Agnostic Journal.

The Bible, however, must elect to be judged by one of two tests; it may base its claim on its alleged "inspiration," or it may stand on its merit as ordinary literature. Now, it has always in the past elected to be judged by the first test; it has claimed to be "the word of God," and, therefore, literature here or literature there, it demanded submission to its teaching. Now-a-days, however, the "inspiration" business is pretty well played out, and an attempt is made—as it is made in the case of Jesus—to shift the ground of the claim. Jesus was set up as a god until the doctrin became ludicrous to even the sensible within the fold; and then—Jesus being no longer possible as God—we had Jesus the "elder brother," and the "ideal man." But in both cases, in that of Jesus as in that of the Bible, the fact of the previous claim having been made is fatal to the success of the latter. Either Jesus is God or nothing; either the Bible is the inspired "word of God," or it is practically valueless, for its value arose from its alleged authority. Let us take a familiar illustration from every-day life of what we are contending. Suppose we were in the midst of a European crisis, and the question of war or peace hung in the balance. Suppose, then, we were brought a report of a speech, say, by Lord Rosebery, on foreign affairs, which indicated the policy which England would pursue. And suppose, after reading that speech, some one came and told us it was a forgery; that Lord Rosebery never delivered such a speech, and that it was a hoax of a country journalist; would we not, in such case, throw away the report as worthless? Its whole value consisted in its authorship; if it was not the opinion of the head of the cabinet, it was practically worthless. In such a case, what would the editor of a great daily newspaper, who had, when he learned that the report was a forgery, thrown it in the waste-paper basket, think of a man who would fetch it out and say: "Well, you know, it's splendid as literature?" . . . As a matter of fact, the Bible—like all books, like all men—despite the artificial estimate of the pulpit, must ultimately stand for what it is worth in the free market-place of the world's literature; and it is rapidly finding its true place. No interested "puffing" can forever blind men to the real value of any article. As representing the literary remains of one people, the Bible will always hav a certain value; portions of it may hav a value of their own. It is not our purpose now to critically appraise it. But the world can never be summed up in any one man, in any one book, in any one literature—and that a dead literature. The world is greater than Israel, greater than Greece, greater than Rome, for the only true and adequate measure of humanity is humanity itself—Frederick Ryan in London Freethinker.

The reason Solomon was so wise can only be accounted for by the fact that he had so many wives and concubines that nothing could happen in or near Jerusalem without his hearing about it at least twelve hundred times.

A man who would cuss wicked enough, and long enough, and loud enough, nowadays to kill a fig tree would not be pointed to as a shining example for boys and girls to follow, but would be boycotted by all the churches in town.

In pointing to Christ as a worthy example for your son to follow, you must first take into consideration that he was condemned and publicly executed as a criminal and a dangerous character to society. While we may believe him to be God's son we must also remember that the pedigree of his stepfather's honorable family ended right there.

Probably the removal of H. L. Green's Freethinkers' Magazine to Chicago was not the cause of the trouble there, but his arrival and the breaking out of the riot were about synchronous. His address is Post Office Drawer 676. Chicago ought to giv him good support.

The morals of Chautauqua went out on a sympathetic strike last Sunday. The excessivly good people there were so anxious to hear news from Chicago that they admitted Sunday papers to their sacred precincts for the first time since the place was dedicated to superficial scholarship and sanctity by statute. After this departure perhaps the men who put a Sunday embargo on knowledge will see the impropriety of keeping from other people news which interests them.—New York World.

Cartoons Are Immense.

BUTLER, IND., June 29, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5, for which please send THE TRUTH SEEKER to my address. It is impossible for me to do without it, for it is one of the best Freethought journals published to-day—fearless and sound to the core; and those cartoons of Heston's are simply immense, teaching us facts more forcibly than words could do. Wishing you and the paper all possible success, I remain, Yours truly, JOHN SAUVEL.

Sent His "Windfall" Here.

WATERVILLE, WASH., June 24, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just had a windfall of $7, and I inclose $6.50 of the same to lubricate the wheels of progress. You can set my subscription ahead one year, and send me Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." I am an old Infidel, and your paper and my sentiments coincide.

Our little town of four hundred inhabitants has seven lawyers, five saloons, five churches, and over half a dozen ministers-of-the-gospel-of-our-Lord-and-Savior-Jesus-Christ-and-seekers-after-the-blood-of-heretics, and still the people complain of hard times; strange, isn't it? Some of the D. D.'s get $1,000 a year to work for Jesus. I work for John Stephens, and don't get half that much.

Respectfully, OSCAR REDFIELD.

When bulldozed legislators dare
To giv the great Chicago Fair
  The treasure of the nation;
Their oath of office quite ignore,
And Bible, too, on which they swore,
To get elected then once more
  Would vote a world's damnation;

When boodled legislators dare
Giv to the gold-bug millionaire
  The finance of the nation,
Then seize the toiler by the collar,
And rob him of his silver dollar,
Then pinch the buzzard till he'll holler
  "In God we trust," for ration;

When impious legislators dare
Out of the Constitution tear
  The safeguard of the nation
'Gainst union vile of church and state,
A base theocracy create
And drive our country to her fate,
  They merit hell's cremation.

MR. EDITOR: If you know anything of the whereabouts of the fool-killer send him to Aberdeen, S. D. This is the note:

At the request of a number of citizens, Mayor Jumper issued a proclamation to the effect that on Tuesday afternoon from three o'clock until six all business places be closed and that the people congregate at the Grain Palace to pray for rain.

[This is a local news item, and of course neither the Star nor its party can justly be held responsible for the idiocy of the mayor and citizens, unless the mayor and citizens officially represent the Populists. But the editor is blameworthy for his failure to rebuke the mayor for his recognition of religion in his public capacity, and he should hav lampooned the prayer folly, that is, if he perceives the folly. But he is not alone in his subserviency to superstition; few editors of country papers, or of other papers, for that matter, dare refuse to sacrifice to the gods of their day. —ED. T. S.]

Priestcraft in the Schoolroom.

COLUMBUS, KAN., June 13, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: This town once had some outspoken Freethinkers and occasional lectures. I am now the only one left that values truth more than all things else. The four churches seemed to vie with each other last winter as to which should gather the most lambs into the "fold;" into the "arms of Jesus."

The schools of Columbus are coming more and more under the manipulation and control of priests and bigots. In the annual normal school of one month a priest officiates often, talks and prays, and sectarian hymns are sung. Exercises of a religious character open the schools in the morning. When present, I silently object and remonstrate. The principal of the high school is a Methodist preacher and a religious bigot, but an able teacher. The facts and logic he demands and enforces in the school are ignored, and emotion, sensation, and exhortation are his ways and means in the pulpit. A boy in his school went to the "distracted" meeting, became excited, and was converted. This professor, it is said, worked upon his credulous mind and easily-led nature and persuaded him, against his inclination, to join the church. The boy joined the "lambs' fold," but is soon sorry he joined. I was introduced to this very pious professor. I said to him that my New York state certificate of fifty years ago would be a curiosity to him. He handed me a letter, saying it was the highest honor he ever received. It was an invitation to go to a certain place and help get up a revival. I felt like giving him "fits," but it was not the time or place. If I ever hav a chance I will giv him a "piece of my mind." Truly, as Job says, "The priests bear rule, and my people will hav it so." Oh, how I hate it! Oh, that God and priests could be kept out of schoolrooms, out of teachers, out of school books!

So Only that We Are Right on the Main Issue.

CHARLEVOIX, MICH., July 7, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: I notice by the tab on my paper that the distance for which I hav paid is at hand, and I am now liable to be put off the train before the next station is reached.

I sometimes feel like discontinuing my journey when I find myself and others with whom I hav a long time associated, classed as robbers, or at least as advocates of robbery, because we hav believed in certain political ideas that seem to differ from those of some of your editorial writers. Such men should remember that it is easy to cry "robber" and "stop thief," but not so easy to present sound reasons and convincing proofs. It is easy to say a thing is thus and so, but a sayso does not always prove it. Grover the great, in one of his wise deliverances, said that it is a condition, not a theory, that confronts us, and now we ordinary people notice that an attempt to apply his pet theory to the condition that then existed has brought him face to face with another condition that for the time being is bringing disaster in place of the prosperity that existed under the other condition he so much deplored. That surplus of treasure that was going to bear us down to ruin is gone, and in its place he has an equally large deficit. Which of the conditions think ye is most pleasing for the people to contemplate? Those, too, who hav been trying to convince us that all government is tyranny are having a little object lesson in their beautiful theory in the condition that confronts them in the present strike. On the whole, we who are not political economists are from the condition that confronts us inclined to believe that a little government influence rightly exerted would be a good thing just at present, at least, as what we see of the workings of the no government plan does not look very encouraging. The system under which the nation prospered and kept a surplus in its treasury would be much preferable to the prospect held out to us by the hundred and one reformers of the day whose stock in trade is theory. Advocate what theory you please of government or no government, so long as you are sound on religious theories I will try to yearly scrape up the amount of government promises to pay and forward the same in order to still hold my place on the list of subscribers to the best paper now published.

Yours for mental liberty

R. G. Horr vs. Bastiat.

PALMYRA, NEB., June 28, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of June 16, 1884, there is a communication from John Peck commenting on the monetary articles of R. G. Horr in the New York Tribune, and he charges that gentleman with whipping the devil round the stump. Allow me to describe an encounter that took place between that celebrated mountebank and myself. It was over that much-vexed question, "Is the greenback a dollar?" I contended that it was the government money, and having the legal tender attachment, it was virtually a dollar. His position was the old, wornout racket that it was a promis to pay a dollar, and that this dollar so named to be paid was a gold or silver dollar. I answered this idea with the statement that the mere words, "Pay the bearer a dollar," were not in themselvs a proof that a coin dollar (gold or silver) was implied, any more than the usual phrases, "The sun rises," "and the sun sets," are true as a matter of fact. I also gave him the form of a receipt given by the officers of revenue to the people when they paid their license and received nothing but greenbacks for the same. We know their receipt said, "Received dollars," not merely promises to pay dollars.

Now the trouble between Mr. Horr and myself comes in right here. He garbled and cut out all these illustrations, thereby destroying the force of my argument and rendering the ideas I wished to convey utterly void and useless. Yet this self-same individual complains that his readers and correspondents "pick out a sentence in one article bereft of its connections, and then a sentence in some other article isolated from its context." He not only does this, but does it knowingly to destroy and make the writer look ridiculous. There is one comfort in this age of printing, and that is, we can counteract him in this nefarious game by printing in other papers; and it is for this end I write this article so as to offset the vapid and maudlin stuff disseminated by such papers as the New York Tribune.

Anyone can get a clear comprehension of what constitutes a monetary unit of value by reading Bastiat's definition of the same. He says: "You hav a crown piece (gold) in your hands; what does it say? If you can read with the eye of the mind the inscription it bears, you can distinctly see the words, Pay to the bearer a service equivalent to that which he has rendered to society, value received and stated." Now let any loyal citizen take this language and transfer it to a greenback, and would it not read as follows? "Pay this loyal soldier, who has rendered to his country patriotic services on the battlefields of said country, any of your goods and chattels which he may need, and we will redeem the same by our revenues." In fact, no government can pay any other dollar than by its taxation. It does not produce or labor so as to produce anything; all it can render is its tax receipt.

Yours for sound money,

JOHN S. MAIBEN.

About Some More Manifestations.

BOSTON, MASS., June 13, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: Believing your valuable paper to be just what its name signifies, viz., a TRUTH SEEKER, and that you wish to enlighten your readers on all subjects of interest, I will add to what I hav already written you on the subject of "Spiritism," my further experience as an honest but skeptical investigator of the subject, which has cost me much time and money; but truth, from whatever source, is to me of more value than gold or honor, although I am in great need of the former, and the latter is but fit for dead saints.

Since I came East this trip I hav had many (to me) wonderful demonstrations of occult or unknown power, both mental and physical; and while I shall leave each reader to divine for himself the cause, I shall giv nothing but the truth as I saw it.

On Sunday, June 10, my wife and I attended a private materializing circle at 55 Rutland street, Boston; attendance, fourteen. The cabinet was at the end of a very large parlor; around the sides of the room were seated the audience. All lights were extinguished except one shaded light on the side of the room, so arranged that it could be turned on or off at will. Many ghost-like figures appeared from the cabinet and, moving across the room, would take the hands of their friends (allowing that the ghost-like figures were materialized spirit friends of those whom they approached), and lead them to the front of the cabinet and there hold, in audible whispers, a conversation of several minutes duration. My skepticism caused me to conclude that all this could be fraud, but soon a figure in white was seen coming up out of the floor by the side of my wife, who sat quite a distance from me and twenty or more feet from the cabinet. While my wife was quite frightened, she was requested to take hold of the then outreaching hands of the materialized form, which she did, when she was led to where I sat, and I accompanied them both nearly to the cabinet, when we were informed that the so-called spirit was that of our deceased daughter who had died many years ago. To my inquiry, "Can you tell who we are or give our names?" the spirit quickly answered, "Papa and Mama Swan," and sealed her words with a kiss; also told us of many others of our friends, giving their names, as being with her. This was rather a puzzle to my skeptical mind, as we were certain that no one in the house or the city could know us, and we had used the precaution to enter the house separately and several minutes apart, as well as to appear like strangers while in the house. Soon after there came to us others of our deceased friends, always giving their names in full, and some of them, by request, materialized outside the cabinet and in full view of all, when, after kissing us, they would dematerialize the same as they came, down through the floor.

As there was seemingly no chance for fraud, via trapdoors or mirrors, and certainly no mesmeric delusions, I fail to understand the phenomena, unless we accept it as claimed by Spiritualists. I had seen much of such scenes before, none of which appeared to my determined and pre-conceived view as anything less than fraud. I hav since witnessed the same several times, as well as nearly all other phases of the so-called spirit manifestations, but as they are so much in opposition to my former Materialistic views as taught by science, and so much beyond the comprehension of my limited ability to understand the great unknown, I can but stand in awe and await further developments.

In the meantime, I wish someone would explain the phenomena, or, if fraud, please tell by what means, and accept from me a timely consideration. A. D. SWAN.

There is No Annihilation.

CHICAGO, ILL., June 28, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: In view of my answer to "An Investigator," another makes the following query:

NEW YORK, March 30, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: In a late number of your paper we find an answer by S. P. Putnam to "An Investigator's" question, but it is not satisfactory to a Freethinker's mind. He says: "The question of immortality is simply to be decided by facts." "We do not say, 'Death ends all,' it simply changes." "There is no such thing as annihilation," etc., etc How does he know that, and advise not to seek for faith but for facts? What facts has he that there is no annihilation? The breath goes out of the body and it turns to dust, and to my reason, based on facts, there is an end. What is known of a hereafter and a God or gods is but imagination. How is that; is it common sense, or facts?

S. R. THORNE.

I wish to say to my friend that he confounds annihilation with dissolution. I do not deny dissolution, or that death ends conscious existence. I do not affirm immortality any more than I affirm annihilation. I deny annihilation for the same reason that I deny creation—because it is inconceivable. That which is absolutely inconceivable cannot be affirmed to be true. We cannot conceive of creation, that is, something made out of nothing; neither can we conceive of annihilation, that is, something becoming nothing. Something can not become nothing; that would be a miracle, as creation is a miracle. If something can become nothing there is an end of scientific inquiry. The basis of science is that, in seeking the effects of a cause, all that is in the cause must be found in the effects; and scientific inquiry does not cease until the whole cause is found in the sum of the effects. Some of the greatest scientific discoveries hav been made on this basis. Science will not allow one iota of the power of the cause to escape scrutiny, and inquiry as to the effect of the cause is not exhausted until the total ability of the cause is exhausted. But if annihilation is granted—namely, that something becomes nothing—then science is not obliged to seek with unwearying patience for all of the cause in the effects; for it may assume that part of the cause, instead of producing effects, is annihilated—has become nothing—in which case inquiry ceases. Does not my friend perceive that the word annihilation, like the word creation, is a purely theological and metaphysical word and altogether unscientific? Science can never use the word annihilation. "Death ends all" only in the sense that it ends our conscious existence, but it does not diminish in the least the amount of matter and force in the universe. My mental existence to-day is a mode of motion. When I die the mode ceases, but there is no diminution of motion. There is just as much motion in the universe after my death as before; and if millions and billions of people should die there would be only a change in the modes of motion, but no loss of motion itself. I believe that when I die my individual conscious mental action ends, as the heat of a fire ends when the fire goes out, but when the heat of the fire ceases, the motion in the heat is not lost. It is simply changed into another mode of motion. So while my individual existence ceases as a mode of force, the force itself does not cease.

My friend and I agree in idea, but we differ in definition. Death is dissolution but not annihilation. If you say that death makes something nothing, then you might just as well say that birth makes nothing something, and you are landed at once in the hands of the theologian. Keep clear of metaphysics and stick to things conceivable; change and dissolution are conceivable, but annihilation is inconceivable and therefore away with it—put it into limbo with "creation."

I am glad my friend has brought attention to this matter, so that I can further explain it. I am a Materialist and Atheist, and in the interest of a sound philosophy and real science must abolish "annihilation" as I do "God" and "immortality" and "creation." S. P. PUTNAM.

In Answer to a Christian.

YAZOO CITY, MISS., June 23, 1894.

MY DEAR FRIEND: Your letters to me are like an oasis in the desert, only your persistent belief in the divinity of a fatherless pretender takes from the oasis much of delight. How I deplore that you can not and will not see what folly there is in such a belief—the Christ, the trinity, a plurality of gods. The idea of making God like a man, or a man like a God! God would cease to be omnipotent at once, when the services of a son were required, or of a Holy Ghost. It is too absurd.

Could you giv me the names of two persons, from all the records of the Old Testament, with whom you would be willing to associate and call friends? Surely two ought to found in all that many. No person of mediocre intelligence, not inclined as the twig was bent, could admit a belief that God ever wrote such a book. I sorrow at such persistent ignorance as I hear from my window every Sunday morning—the stentorian voices of some five bipeds, teaching God's word, teaching the word of omnipotency. Teachers, indeed, when one-half of them hav not as much sense as a June bug! One-half preach, not for Almighty God, but the almighty dollar, while the remainder believe what they teach because they hav preached it so long.

It does not take a man of great brains to pound the Bible and vehemently expound its doctrins. Even I, your friend, could do it. I would not care for more than ten thousand a year, including such perquisits as my financiering might originate, and living in luxury I could choose of the pretty apples in the garden, and without danger of banishment, when you consider how much sharper is man of modern times than was our father Adam of old. But, little woman, I could not be persuaded to teach that which I do not believe, because I am fully convinced of its utter fallacy.

Come, tell me if there is any progression in all this Christ doctrin. If there was I too would sanction it, regardless of his sensational birth or unknown pater familias. It has been taught over and over for eighteen hundred years, and you can not tell me that it has ever produced a single invention or discovery, except those diabolical implements for the not gentle persuasion of heretics. It teaches nothing conducive to the health, happiness, comfort, welfare, and progression of mankind.

See how searchers in scientific matters hav been thrown into prison, banished, murdered, by your Christian laws. Your and my nativ land of the stars and stripes, "the home of the brave and the land of the free," in its Christian superstition and fanaticism, drew the life-blood time and again from unprotected innocence, even not anterior to the days when your and my grandsires were the lawmakers.

Only for such great men as Paine and Jefferson, the fathers of our Constitution and country, the great United States of America might never hav been. Ask intelligence and truth what the Infidel Thomas Paine did towards its independence, and pronounce him a falsifier who would assert that Thomas Jefferson believed in a triune God or a revealed religion. I repeat, the teacher or individual who really believes in revealed religion and a plurality of Gods, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; that Satan was once an archangel, and page after page of such stuff, while all science and nature disprove it—such an exponent is either a moral coward fearing to "seek that ye may find," by reading both sides of the question, or a weak effort of nature to produce something—in God's own image, as the Bible terms it.

The blood-stains, persecution, misery, and cruelties caused by ignorance, isms, and creeds, the direct outcome of Christianity, would decide me, were the gift only mine, to Balaam into eternal self-abnegation all those who are now seeking an amendment to our national Constitution, whereby church can dictate to the lawmaker. I would hav you, of all persons, stop and calmly consider what the church is making an effort to do and what would be the future consequence. Christ, the only begotten son of God, half man and half God, yet omnipotent and omniscient, establishes his church on earth, hangs out his sign, "This is the way and the light, all ye who believe shall hav everlasting life, all who do not believe shall be damned"—yet is compelled to ask assistance from the damned (those sinners at Washington) that the country may be ruled from a Christian standpoint, i.e., whether you like it or not, you shall take sugar in your coffee.

ROBIN DE SHA.

Not in Debt to Jesus.

FRIEND, NEB., June 26, 1894.

MR EDITOR: I am interested in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am interested in its teachings. I am interested in all things having a tendency to teach the gospel of intellectual hospitality—the liberty of thought and speech—and I sincerely hope THE TRUTH SEEKER will continue to prosper, to enlighten the world, to teach man to think more of his fellow creatures and less of the orthodox God. How can we do anything for God, who is all-wise? How can he, justly, expect anything from us, his children, who are totally depraved, totally destitute of holiness or good principles? If God intended us to love him, to worship him, to remember him in the days of our youth, why did he not giv us the power of reason at birth? What a wonderful thought! Only think of it; at birth we know nothing, we hav no power of reason, know not right from wrong, are absolutely devoid of intellect. That God would leave us in just such a state is not to be called in question; we all know that it is our own personal efforts which bring us forward in this world; certainly God is doing nothing for us; we mold or mar our character without the assistance of supernatural power. I am the child of parents who believe in the Congregational creed. While they do not contend that a vast majority of men are predestined unto everlasting torment, and others foreordained unto everlasting bliss, yet they do believe in rewards and punishments. They do believe that an infinit being is watching over us, is keeping "tab" on our actions, giving us credit for the virtuous deeds, and making us debtors for the evil ones; while I do not believe in one nor the other, yet I regard their opinion as worthy of respect. I shall always respect the belief of others, in whatever manner or degree it may differ from my own. Denying others the right to their belief would be enslaving ourselvs to our own opinion, consequently I shall always support the right of every man to his opinion, which is more than the minister can say. Does it not seem strange that the orthodox minister cannot preach a sermon without attacking the belief of others? They will stand in the pulpit, and inform the Freethinker, the reformer, the moral man, that he is a miserable wretch, that he is a fool and not worthy of existence, yet these same ministers will tell you that they (the ministers) invariably reward an evil action with a good one, returning good for evil, and love their enemies. What a wonderful degree of hypocrisy! Those who advocate this doctrin of loving their enemies are to be guarded against; they go down on record as having wrecked more homes than any other class of people on the face of the earth.

I recall to memory this incident of a few years ago: The minister had given me a very cordial invitation to join his church; he approached me, saying: "You were raised in a Christian family, and how it would please your people to learn of your having come out from the world, and taken the start," etc. I interrupted him here, saying such things should not be taken into consideration at all, the only thing to be considered, in taking such a step, was the love for the Lord Jesus Christ, and yet I would venture to say that three-fourths of the church-members of to day had joined because some one here on earth had influenced them, and if they would giv us their candid thoughts they would hav to confess that they knew not what the love for the Lord Jesus was like, but had become members of the church with the single desire to promote themselvs socially and financially. I once asked in Sunday-school about the acceptance of miracles just as they were described in the Bible. Our teacher, a man of excellent general information, answered me in the following language: "They are questions which probably we had better not pry into too deeply." I reasoned that if such a condition of the mind was necessary to salvation, I would certainly die an unsaved man. By investigation I hav found that the Bible is a book that can be construed to conform to the belief of not only every church denomination on the globe, but every man on the earth can pick it to pieces and accept that which suits him. Yet people will attend church, paying a minister from $500 up, for preaching the gospel when he (the minister) is no better than the average man; in many respects is not one-half so honorable, and is in the ministry because it is as lucrativ and pleasant as any kind of work. What an abominable practice! I believe in being honest with my fellow-men. I think it policy. I do think we owe our fellow-citizens something—namely, respect; treat them fairly in our dealings. Although I hold no certificate, showing payment in full, bearing the fac-simile signature of Jesus Christ, yet I do not consider that I owe him anything, and how some people can figure themselvs in his debt is beyond my comprehension. Free Trade vs. Protection.

NEW YORK, July 7, 1894.

MR. EDITOR: The letter of Mr. Chas. O. Hays, defending protection against free trade, shows how limited his understanding must be, and it is truly himself who is to be pitied, for he seems not to comprehend the meaning of "free trade in labor."

That the manufacturers consider protection a blessing is only natural. No one will dispute it, because the government comes to their aid in taxing the foreign articles up to fifty per cent and more, so that the consumers are compelled to pay that much more, if they wish a better article, or buy a home product of poorer quality, which will giv the manufacturer so much extra profit. If our manufacturers had to compete with the Europeans, they would hav to produce a better article, or be satisfied with less profits; but their establishments and trade would rest on a sounder, natural foundation, the laws of demand and supply, growing more slowly but surer. The protection policy bestows large profits, therefore stimulates over-production, and its consequences will from time to time react in stagnation and bad times. A protected manufacturer is always in fear of tariff changes, which could not and will not happen under free trade.

The old protectionist cry about European pauper labor has about lost its great force as a scarecrow, even for the laborers; by reading our daily papers we find that there is enough pauper labor here to shame us. At the same time one hears continuous boasting about the American's superior intellect; much the best mechanics, the highest inventiv geniuses, are to be found here. Now we are at least three thousand miles away from Europe; some raw material is shipped from here, to be worked up there and brought back here, and still our geniuses cannot compete with Europe! Fie! the greater the shame! Has Mr. C. Hayes never read or heard that some of our manufacturers send their products to Europe and elsewhere and sell them there cheaper than at home to us?

Mr. C. Hays writes: "This may seem paradoxical to the narrow intellect of a free-trader; but if his reason were allowed to expand a little, he would see that Europe can sell more cheaply than we do, but that Europe will not sell as cheaply as we do, unless compelled to do so by a tariff." What nonsense in this last sentence. Does he not know yet who has to pay the tax? If our government collects about two or three hundred millions of dollars tariff taxes from us, we, the people of the United States, hav to pay at least about twelve hundred millions extra into the pockets of protected manufacturers, but I doubt if Mr. C. Hays will understand it, any more than he understands "free trade in labor."

How long the snare, "Protection increases wages," will delude the great mass of ignorant poor laborers I cannot tell, but many are getting clearer ideas about it. If protection is such a boon for the laborers, how comes it that they hav had to fight and strike these thirty years for higher wages and against reduction? Does not Mr. Hays know that when sugar was put on the free list its price fell two cents a pound right away; at the same time Congress gave to the sugar producers a bounty of two cents for every pound of sugar produced, as protection. But where do the potato and cabbage farmers come in? Is it right? One outcome of this protection system has been the building up of very large establishments, or plants, which combine into trust companies for the avowed purpose of reducing the cost of production, by the dismissal of many laborers and closing some of the establishments, and enabling them to fix their own prices in buying and selling their wares, to make immense profits to divide among themselvs, and to suppress all competition. Is this so desirable? Could Anarchy be much worse? The government to help the rich plunders the common people. The Republican government has lent to the national banks its or our money to allow them double interest thereon from us, the people; this government has squandered bonds and land grants on railroad sharpers, who had Representativs as silent partners. Has C. Hays ever heard or read of the Credit Mobilier?

Two years ago the government advertised for extra large forgings. It gave the contract to the Carnegie works, Bethlehem, Pa. Nevertheless our government could hav made them for $400,000 less, as we read in the papers, but thought it good policy to encourage these private concerns to establish large plants, for which the people had to pay. What are our thanks, as we read? We are deceived and defrauded by these very works!

Is it any wonder that we hav now so many thousands of millionaires and millions of paupers and tramps? Forty years ago we had only a few of either, but we were a contented people. A man can be happy and liv in luxury; no need of having a million, and if not satisfied it only shows a wolfish nature, likely to become a curse to mankind. A radical change is badly needed to improve all this. I propose only two taxes—the town (or city), county, and state tax on ground alone, all improvements thereon to be free; for the national government a graded income tax. Abolish custom houses and discharge a myriad of parasite officeholders, and giv us more liberty. FREDERICK KOPZLY.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Two Little Girls.

This little girl is very poor;
She has troubles, she finds, she can scarce endure:
And yet, my dear, she has playthings plenty—
Dolls as many as two-and-twenty,
Houses, and arks, and picture books,
Something pretty wherever she looks.
But half the time she's puzzled to know
What to do with the wonderful show,
Tired of dollies two-and-twenty,
And bored with her various toys a-plenty.

That little girl is very rich,
With an old doll like a perfect witch,
A broken chair and a bit of delf,
And a wee cracked cup on the closet she'f.
She can play with only a row of pins;
Houses and gardens, arks and inns,
She makes with her chubby fingers small,
And she never asks for a toy at all.
Unseen around her the fairies strav,
Giving her bright thoughts every day.

Poor little girl and rich little girl,
How nice it would be if in time's swift whirl
You could—perhaps not change your places,
But catch a glimps of each other's faces;
For each to the other could something giv,
Which would make the child life sweeter to liv,
For both could giv and both could share
Something the other had to spare.

Crime and the Criminal.

Of all the subjects that are to-day attracting the attention of the political economist, the philanthropist, and the statesman, that of crime is without doubt the most important. It is a subject that, like "Banquo's ghost," will not down, but constantly rises up and demands attention. So we must either attend to it and try to overcome it or it will overcome us.

It is a sad fact, that with our increase in population and with our apparent advance in civilization, crime more than keeps pace with both, and is increasing so rapidly that our state and county governments hav hard work to cope with it and provide places of confinement for the criminal classes.

Every person has a pet remedy for crime, that is like patent medicin, a sure cure; but nothing so far has proven an entire success, and in spite of all remedies crime is steadily increasing, not only in the number of crimes committed, but also in the tendency to commit greater crimes in place of smaller ones.

When the census of 1890 was taken there were 60,079 criminals confined in our state penitentiaries and reformatories; of this number 5,102 were women. Shakespare makes Hamlet say, "Frailty, thy name is woman;" but this should hav read, "Frailty, thy name is man," for twelve times more men than women commit crime.

Let us take a glance at the principal causes of crime, so we can better understand the nature of the evil, and thus be in a better position to apply the remedy, for if we are going to look for a remedy for crime, we must first diagnose the case and understand thoroughly the causes for which we are going to prescribe a remedy.

We will find, when we come to look into the causes of crime, that they are as varied and differential as are the crimes themselvs.

One of the great causes of crime, admitted by all to be one of the principal ones, is that of ignorance; to overcome ignorance, we hav established the finest system of public schools that the world has ever seen, but the schools hav not had the desired effect of decreasing the amount of crime; for in spite of the greater intelligence of the people, the number of crimes committed each year still increases.

But this may be accounted for by the fact that our public schools spend too much of the time in giving the children book learning and not devoting enough time to the teaching of good morals; it is often the case that our public-school teachers consider that their full duty is done when they hav succeeded in teaching the pupils reading, spelling, etc., but therein lies a great mistake, for education without moral training is merely putting a weapon into the hands of the vicious. How often we hear of this man or boy who has been led astray by the reading of some trashy novel. If, when he learned to read, he had also been taught good morals and how to choose his literature, he would not hav been thus led astrav.

The next cause of crime to be considered is that of bad company. Of all the causes of crime it is the greatest. We find from statistics that it is charged with being the cause of one-third of all crimes. The flocking of the people to the great cities, where they are crowded together, is materially adding to the preponderance of this now too powerful cause.

The great majority of our professional criminals became criminals before they were twenty years old, and they were not led into crime by the prompting of hunger nor from a special lack of honesty, but in almost every case they were led astray by the bad example of their associates.

I wish to call special attention to the fact that our present method of dealing with the youthful offender is one of the greatest mistakes in our management of the criminal element. Take for example a boy who, out of mischief, has broken the law; it being his first offense. This boy is taken before a magistrate and is sentenced to serve time in one of our jails. There he is put in the same apartment with the old and hardened criminal; thus, he is thrown into the worst of company, and must overhear them tell all kinds of tales about crimes that they hav committed and he is thus instructed for a career of crime. Thus, very often, we make criminals of our boys by our manner of punishing them. I once heard a noted man say that our city jails were the primary schools, the county jails the grammar schools, and the state penitentiaries the high schools of crime, and it seems to me he was just about right. To overcome this evil feature of our criminal punishment, all youthful offenders should be confined separate and apart from the older criminals.

The worst breeding-spots of crime are the slums of our larger cities; here it is that the effect of bad company shows its fine hand. The children of the poor people hav no playground except the street. There they come in contact with the worst element, and soon by their teaching and bad example the boy who, if otherwise surrounded, might hav become a good citizen is almost sure to become a criminal.

Drink is the next cause of crime that we will consider. Drink has always been considered the greatest cause of crime, but statistics fail to bear out the assertion; for, while bad company is charged with thirty-three per cent of crime, only twenty per cent can be charged to drink. Drink, as a rule, is the cause of petit offenses, such as assault and battery and disturbance of the public peace.

From the above statements it will be seen that bad company and drink together are the cause of over half of all the crimes committed.

Poverty as a cause of crime is small, but often poverty is the indirect cause of a criminal career; for it often happens that a poor person livs in a bad neighborhood and thus gets into bad company and is often led to drink to drown his sorrows, and thus, indirectly, poverty is the cause of a great amount of crime.

The other causes of crime are idleness, bad temper, opportuni y, and want of principle; these four cause about one-fourth of the crimes. Very often, when the reason for the commission of a crime is not traceable to any one of the above causes, it is found to be the result of a combination of two or more of these causes.

The last cause to be considered is that of hereditary influences. It is often found that certain persons are predisposed to crime. These poor mortals are marked by their ancestors and they seem to take to crime as naturally as a duck does to water. For a long time heredity as a cause of crime was laughed at by the knowing ones, but to-day, after long years of careful research, it is an established fact.

The child of a criminal inherits a di position to commit crime, and for that reason it is now proposed to try and prevent criminals from marrying, and thus prevent them from reproducing criminals.

Next let us look at the methods of dealing with crime. In early times almost every crime was punished by death. The rulers of those early days hoped by this harsh method to stop crime; but it was found that the severity of the punishment had very little if any effect on the amount of crime. Gradually the number of crimes which were punishable with death hav been diminished, till now there remains only two crimes that are punished with death; these are murder and treason. Even the death penalty for murder has been abolished in some of the states.

Our present method of dealing with crime is to make punishment certain for the person who commits it, so that he will in the future refrain from doing anything wrong and that the example of his punishment may keep other men from crime.

Of late years the severity of the punishment has been lessened and the criminal has been treated with greater kindness, and his accommodations in the prison hav been improved to such an ex ent that it now often happens that the prisoner is better fed, clothed, and housed within the prison walls than he would be if he were free to take care of himself out in the world.

Then, too, the certainty of punishment is so small, that even if the punishment was very severe, still there are so many chances of escaping punishment that an average criminal would never stop to think of the penalty. We find that only 42 per cent. of the criminals are caught, and of that number only 55 per cent. are convicted, so we see that only 25 per cent. of the criminals are punished for the crimes they commit. With such a good chance of avoiding punishment, is it any wonder that the criminal never lets the fear of punishment deter him from crime.

Another fact which shows that our present system of dealing with the criminal element is a failure, is the fact that over 50 per cent. of the convicts are recommitted, showing that the terror of prison life and the severity of prison discipline does not keep the convict from again breaking the law.

Correspondence.

Elberton, Ga., June 21, 1894.

Dear Miss Wixon: This is my fourth letter to The Truth Seeker. It is vacation now. The teachers' meeting is being held in Elberton this week. Two of my sisters are teachers. I would be quite lonesome in vacation if it wasn't for a little girl living close to me named Hammond Burch. We are together nearly all of the time, and we play all sorts of things. I don't like to play with real dolls, but I like to dress up a squash and play with it. Hammond and I play with them. The June bugs are as thick around our house as can be. Yesterday I caught five together. I would like for some of the boys and girls to write to me. We thought there would be a famine, but we hav had some rain lately. We hav a calf and it has to stay in its stall all the time. I gather grass and weeds for it. I remain your friend,

Olive Bell.

St. Joseph, Mo., June 10, 1894.

Dear Miss Wixon: As my other letter found a place in The Truth Seeker, I venture to write again.

Our city has been visited by two Freethinking lecturers this spring, Mr. Remsburg and Mr. Steiner, of Des Moines, Ia. I heard them and enjoyed both very much. Neither had a large audience, as most of our citizens would rather go to church. I go to high school and, with the exception of one boy, am the only Freethinker. Two of my most intimate friends are very religious, and I often shock them by expressing some of my liberal views in their presence. They say they are getting used to me now and are not surprised at anything I say. We hav a very good public library here, but they hav no really Liberal books. They hav some of Walter Besant's works, which are the most liberal of any I hav been able to obtain there. One day in our rhetoric class we came across a reference to Eve as being the first woman. Our teacher asked who Eve was, and one little girl answered, "Noah's wife." Amid a loud burst of laughter some one answered, "She was the first woman, and the first man Adam's wife." In the pause that followed I said, "I don't th nk there ever was an Adam or Eve either." They all looked very much astonished, and our teacher answered, "Well, I think those are the names by which we designate the first man and woman." We are not allowed to d s cuss such subjects in our classes, so it had to stop there.

Hoping to see this in the Children's Corner, and that it is not too long a letter, I am, as ever, your Freethinking friend,

Nora McCoy.

P.S.—Quite an Irish name, isn't it? But I am happy to say, if my ancestors were Irish, I am not a Catholic. N.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

AN UNOFFICIAL PATRIOT. By Helen H. Gardener, author of "Men, Women, and Gods," "Is This Your Son, My Lord?" "Facts and Fictions of Life," etc., etc. Boston: Arena Publishing Company. Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

We hav done with "An Unofficial Patriot" what we get time to do with very, very few books—read it through, every word from dedication to finis. It is a breezy, interesting, thought-provoking work. We like it. We cheerfully recommend it. It's hero is Griffith Davenport, born in 1809 in Virginia. His father was a country 'squire, a slaveholder, an Episcopalian, quick-tempered, opinionated, old-fashioned in his ideas, but genial, kindly, devoted to his family, honest. In 1824 Methodism made its advent in Virginia. It appealed to different minds and temperaments than those content to jog along in the time-honored, respectable Episcopalian path. Young Davenport had never doubted. There was no questioning of the old faith in his father's household or among his associates. That his father swore volubly at the slaves did not seem to the boy to be strange or wrong or at all incompatible with the conventional religion of his home, with its stated prayers and formal table graces. When, therefore, in his nineteenth year, Griffith was baptized into the Methodist fold and entered upon the career of a circuit rider there was amazement, consternation, anger in his parents' home. But the young man had a "conscience" and he could be happy only when doing what he considered to be his "duty." That for him was the line of least resistance, the line which we all follow.

With the irruption of the new, more emotional religion, came, as a consequence, other disturbing fancies and thoughts. Minds aroused out of the lethargy that had previously held them quiescent necessarily sought divergent avenues of activity. There were born vague doubts about the institution of slavery. Was the institution right per se? If right for the laity, was it right for the clergy to hold slaves, to buy and sell fellow Christians? That sensitiv conscience was agitated, strained, tormented. Griffith had owned from boyhood a body servant, very much devoted to him. With his wife there came from her father other slaves into his power. The embryo abolitionist had long ago vowed that he would never buy or sell one of the dark race. And now his father insisted that he should make his home upon one of the family plantations. Thus still more slaves were forced under his control. There came a time when he had to buy the husband of one of his "girls" to prevent a heart-breaking separation, not otherwise avoidable. The struggle and final defeat cost him dearly. Griffith realized, as only those can who lived in the South in slavery days, the difficulties in the way of the master who would free himself from the curse of ownership. The slaves knew nothing of self-dependence. They knew nothing of life in the free states. To leave them free in Virginia was a felony. An unfamiliar sight in the North, they could not there, at that time, liv in peace. But this man of whom Helen Gardener writes at last made up his mind that he would in some way rid his concience of this ever-increasing burden; he would take his sons to some place to be educated "where the trend of thought is toward freedom," he said. He had, by correspondence and assistance, secured a position in a small college in Indiana. He arranged with a Washington lawyer for the manumission of his slaves. He sold his landed property. He met his first great disappointment when he gathered the negroes at the "big house" to giv them their freedom papers. They had expected some gift, a plug of "terbacker," a "caliker" dress, something to eat, drink, or wear. And there was nothing but papers. Those are not the only people who hav been careless of liberty for themselvs and others for the sake of a dower or a stipend. Not a ray of light came into the black faces. "Not one grasped the full meaning of it all. It was evident that one and all expected to liv along as before—to follow the fortunes of the family."

At last the Davenport caravan is off for Washington. Two of the negro boys run away, preferring to remain amid the old surroundings. Thus is Griffith made liable to arrest whenever he shall again set foot in Virginia. At last the Long Bridge is crossed, the "dead line" is passed, they are in Washington. The slaves were taken to the cabins secured beforehand for them. Then Griffith and Katherine repaired to the office of their lawyer. They had taken it as a matter of course that a few of the older house servants, and Jerry and his family, would accompany them to their new home. But now they learned, to their intense dismay, that the Constitution of Indiana forbade the taking of negroes into the state or giving them employment. We of to-day can readily understand the purpose of these inhibitions, when we take note of our Chinese exclusion acts. Competition with "white" labor could not, cannot be allowed. Such is the argument. So the Davenport negroes were all left in Washington, a sum of money having been put into the lawyer's hands for the partial support of the more aged ones.

The environment in the Western state was peculiar and unpleasant, but gradually the Virginians became accustomed to it and the clouds drifted up and away, to a certain extent. The boys grew to manhood; the eldest went to Missouri to help conduct a paper opposed to the extension of slavery into the territories. Lincoln was elected. The storm burst. The printing office was burned by the pro-slavery adherents and Beverley Davenport escaped to Kansas and enlisted in a regiment making up in that state. The two other boys also entered the service. Governor Morton, Indiana's famous war executiv, knew Griffith well and after the disaster at Bull Run he recommended to President Lincoln the employment of Griffith Davenport as a guide for the Union armies in Virginia. Griffith was summoned to Washington. He came into the presence of Lincoln, but at first he positivly refused to engage in the work required of him. He was deeply attached to his old home and the people who had been the companions of his youth and early manhood. He could not bring himself to consent to lead a hostil army to devastate the one and drive out or slay the others. It was only after Lincoln had shown him that it was his duty, as a Union man and a lover of his kind, to do all he could to restore the Union and to prevent the repetition of such useless sacrifices as that at Bull Run that he consented to guide an engineer's corps through the valleys and over the mountains of his beloved nativ state. He had once more yielded to his conscience and he did faithfully and well the work he had promised to do, albeit at great cost to his feelings. He returned safely to his home and died before the close of the great conflict, but not before he had accomplished all that lay within the power of an "unofficial patriot."

This book is a Freethought work only by suggestion, but none the less it must hav a great liberalizing influence. How little of comfort there is in the tenets of orthodox Christianity is unobtrusivly but effectivly shown in the closing pages of Chapter XVII. Beverly Davenport, in a letter written to his mother from a Tennessee camp while his father was on duty in Virginia, says:

"'Dear old father! His last letter to me was an inspiration and a sermon, in living (as he is), without the least bit of preaching in it. He doesn't need to preach. He livs far better than any creed or than any religion; but——'

"Katherine broke off and pondered. Was Beverly still reading Thomas Paine? If he were to be killed! What did he believe? 'Livs far better than any creed or than any religion,' what did he mean? Had Beverly become openly an unbeliever in creeds and religions? The thought almost froze her blood. She fell upon her knees and wept and prayed—not for her son's life to be spared from the bullets of the enemy, as was her habit, but that the 'shafts of the destroyer' might spare his soul! Her cup of anxiety and sorrow was embittered and made to overflow by the sincerity of a belief which was so simple, and knew so little of evasion, that the bottomless pit did, indeed, yawn before her for this son of her youth.

"'Save him, save him,' she moaned aloud, 'if not from death, at least from destruction, O God of my salvation!'

"The terrors which should follow unbelief had been long ago, in her rigid Presbyterian home, made so much a part of her very nature, that the simple cheerful, happy side of Griffith's religion, which had been uppermost all these years, had not even yet, in cases of unusual stress, obliterated the horror of Katherine's literal belief in and fear of an awful hell, and a vengeance-visiting God for those who slighted or questioned the justice or truth of a cruel revelation of him. A great and haunting fear for Beverly's soul eclipsed her fear for his life, and Katherine's religion added terrors to the war that were more real and dark and fearful than the real horrors that are a natural and legitimate part of a cruel civil contest. The 'comforts,' to a loving heart and a clear head, of such a religion were vague and shadowy, indeed. Its certain and awful threats were like a flaming sword of wrath before her eyes. To those who could evade the personal application of the tenets of their faith, who could accept or reject at will the doctrins they professed, who could wear as an easy garment the parts they liked, and slip from their shoulders the features of their 'revelation' to which the condition of their own loved ones did not respond, there might be comfort. Her faith was so real and firm it did not doubt a literal damnation nor could she read from under the decree those she loved, simply because she loved them. An eternal decree of suffering hung over her first-born, the idol of her soul! The awful burden of her religion was almost more than she could bear in these days of fear and loneliness, stimulated as it was by the ever-present threat and shadow of death for the lamb that had strayed, ever so little, from the orthodox fold. Her days were doubly burdened by the new anxiety, shadowed by the real, and haunted by the agony of fear for the imaginary danger, to her son. In her dreams that night, she saw him stand before an angry and avenging God, and she awoke in a very panic of delirium and mental anguish. Great beads of moisture stood upon her brow. 'Save him! save him O God of our salvation!' she cried out, and little Margaret stirred uneasily in her bed."

The Orthod-ox Team.

"Hold on, stranger! Turn out yonder close to the wall!
For the road's very narrow, and I've got it all!
Whoa, back, haw there, old Baptist!
Whoa, Methodist, whoa!
These are oxen that need all the road, you must know.
Yes, I drive without swearin', though strange it may seem,
For I'm drivin',good stranger, my orthodox team!"
Said the lumberman of Calaveras.

"That Episcopal ox is of excellent breed;
Much more noted for style than he is for his speed,
'Though of delicate structure, this ox will not shirk,
Yet he never was known, sir, to sweat at his work.
He's a good, pious ox, never losing his way,
For he reads all the sign-boards, and goes not astray!"
Said the lumberman of Calaveras.

"There's the good Baptist ox; he's hard-shell to the bone;
Close communion in diet—he eats all alone!
Shakes his head when it's rainin' and closes his eyes;
He hates to be sprinkled, though it comes from the skies!
Why, he won't cross a bridge unless dragged by the team;
He'll go nowhere, I swar, but 'down into'
the stream!"
Said the lumberman of Calaveras.

"Presbyterian, gee! Congregational, haw!
They're good stock, let me tell you, and know how to draw!
They're so perfectly matched, sir, that very few folk
Can tell them apart when they're out of the yoke!
Yet you see a slight difference when it is shown:
One leans on his Elders and one stands alone!"
Said the lumberman of Calaveras.

"There's an ox I term Israel—oldest of all;
Once he grazed in the garden before
Adam's fall;
He went into the ark at the time of the flood,
And when Pharoah starved he was chewin'
his cud!
There's an ancestry, sir, full of glory, no doubt,
But for goring the Master, they're scattered about!"
Said the lumberman of Calaveras.

"Ive an ox over there who tends strictly to biz;
He's a Catholic ox; what a monster he is!
And he keeps growin' big, while he keeps growin' old,
And be never let's go when he once gets a hold!
He's a strong one, you bet! Why, I never yet spoke
But he started right off with neck in the yoke!"
Said the lumberman of Calaveras.

"There's old Methodist, one of the best on the road!
You'd suppose by the fuss he alone dragged the load!
How he pulls when I sing hallelujah, and shout;
But the worst of it is, he keeps changin'
about!
He was bought on probation, and works
like a top,
But I've had him three years, and suppose
I must swop!"
Said the lumberman of Calaveras.

"That suave Universalist many admire,
Claims the devil's a myth, with his great prairie fire!
There's my Adventist claimin' to hav second sight;
If he keeps on a-guessin' he'll guess the thing right!
And the Seventh Day Baptist; their numbers are such,
If they do break the Sabbath, they don't break it much!"
Said the lumberman of Calaveras.

"Got a Spiritist? Yes, sir, I bought him
by chance;
When it comes to hard work he goes off in a trance.
Nothing practical, sir, in a medium ox,
If you hav to keep proddin' with rappin's and knocks.
But I must keep movin' and ploddin' along
With my orthod ox team, or the world will go wrong!"
Said the lumberman of Calaveras.

"Take the road that I came, and beware of short cuts;
You will not lose the way if you follow the ruts.
I am sorry to force you, my friend, to turn out,
But this is the regular lumberman's route.
On the road of life, stranger, my right is supreme.
The whole world must turn out for my orthod-ox team!"
Said the lumberman of Calaveras.

Miss Wixon has taken as her mottoes in writing this beautiful book of 292 pages—which she has dedicated to the memory of her father and mother—these sentences from the works of a great synthetic philosopher and a gifted liberal minister:

As with the physical, so with the ethical. A belief, as yet fitful and partial, is beginning to spread amongst men, that here, also, there is an indissoluble bond between cause and consequence, an inexorable destiny, a law which altereth not.—Herbert Spencer.

Living is an Art, a method of expressing great conceptions; in fact, the highest method, the noblest of the Arts.—Thomas Starr King.

Pleasure and Progress.

AN ATTEMPT TO PROVE THAT

The Pursuit of Pleasure is the Sine Qua Non of Intellectual, Moral, and Social Development, and that The Promotion of Pleasure is the Duty of Philanthropy and Statesmanship.

By Albert M. Lorentz, LL.B.

CONTENTS:

Book I.—Pleasure: Chap. I.—Sources of Pleasure. Chap. II.—Material Pleasures. Chap. III.—Ideal Pleasures. Chap IV.—Social Pleasures. Chap. V.—Pleasures of the Savage, the Barbarian and the Civilized. Chap. VI.—Genesis of religions. Chap. VII.—Christianity.

Book II.—Intellectual Development: Chap. I.—Purpose of life. Chap, II.—Material Pleasures. Chap. III.—Ideal Pleasures: Knowledge. Chap. IV.—Ideal Pleasures: Reason. Chap.—V. Ideal Pleasures: Character. Chap. VI.—Social Pleasures. Chap. VII.—Pedagogical Despotism.

Book IV.—Social Development: Chap. I.—Progress. Chap. II.—Protection, Capitalism, and Socialism: Respectivly an Actual, an Imminent, and a Proposed Violation of Individual Sovereignty. Chap. III.—Condition of Agriculture. Chap. IV. Public Schools, the Mene, Mene, Tekel of Socialism. Chap. V.—Province of Government. Chap. VI.—Our Social Disorder.

Here are some of the verdicts on this remarkable production which have been rendered by men who are in every way qualified as judges of books:

This is a spirited, rattling sort of a book that skates right along over the deepest subject with out much thought whether the ice is thin or not. It answers the greatest question—What is the use, object, motive, purpose, and summum bonum of life, and the real cause and motive of progress? —by one word, Pleasure!—Thaddeus B. Wakeman,

He sharply attacks, also, modern methods of education, and in this he is most abundantly borne out by the facts, and his arraignment is practically unanswerable. His book is altogether a curious and suggestive one.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

The man who wrote this book knows how to write a book, and knows what he is writing about. There is not a padded sentence in the volume, not an attempt to fill up with words for lack of knowledge. The author deals hard blows at shams and falsehoods, and hard blows for realities and truth. We do not see how anyone can read this book and disagree with the leading propositions. The work is good; every chapter is worth reading. It is a work of common-sense Socialism. The chapter on public schools ought to be put into a tract and sent to every teacher in the land. Thousands of sentences are worthy of being framed as political maxims and hung up all over the nation. the book deserves a wide reading, not only for its literary style, which is clear and incisive, but for is bold, honest sayings.—L. K. Washburn.

After you read this book you will be as enthusiastic in praise of it as are the eloqnent editor of the Investigator and the gallant President of the Canadian Secular Union, Pleasure and Progress" has 398 pages, is splendidly printed from large, clear type, on excellent paper, and costs, bound in cloth, $1; paper covers, 50 cents.

The Creation of God.

By DR. JACOB HARTMANN.

An explanation of the origin of the God Idea, and the mental processes that led to the formation of idols and the worship of them. From the time of Terah's apostasy, Abraham's reformation and his banishment for heresy and blasphemy against the Chaldean idols, to Christ's coming, the principal characters are analyzed and shown to be human, by thought and deed. It is made plain that the peculiar phraseology, cant sayings, subterfuges, miracles, wonder-workings, and supernatural padding are the proper offspring of the then existing barbarism, ignorance, and superstition, constituting the peculiar politics of the day.

Gems of Thought.

So FAR as a doctrin can influence general conduct, the doctrin of evolution, in its social applications, is calculated to produce a steadying effect, alike on thought and action.—Herbert Spencer.

WHILE it may be right to permit majorities to rule, this does not mean that minorities should not be fairly represented. The American idea of running over minorities is full of injustice and danger.—Galveston News.

THOU hast conquered, O pale Galilean;
the world has grown grey from thy breath;
We hav drunken of things Lethean, and fed on the fulness of death.
—Algernon Charles Swinburne.

THE Chinese are not a people who persecute for opinion. Persons professing four different forms of faith or sets of doctrins hav lived side by side, and the teachers of each hav worked in peace for centuries. No man's promotion in the public service is increased or retarded because he is of this or that form of religion.—The Churchman.

WHAT does it matter whether you are governed by a saber, a holy-water sprinkler, or an umbrella-stick? In any case it is a stick, and I am surprised that men of progress should wrangle about the choice of the cudgel that is to tickle their shoulders, while it would be far more progressiv and less expensiv to smash it up and throw the pieces to all the devils.—Leo Tolstoï.

SENSIBILITY and Insight married, and had a child, and called it Genius, and by that name it has been known to this day. People pass, and, not seeing its father and mother, say: "Whose offspring is it? It must hav dropped from the sky; it must hav had a miraculous birth; its existence is a marvel we may not pretend to understand." The parents smile proudly at this, but they keep their secret to themselvs.—Joseph Dana Miller.

NO ONE can watch the sincerity of religious endeavor, the warmth of religious feeling, the nobleness of religious conduct among races whom we are inclined to call either pagan or savage, without learning, at all events, a lesson of humility. Anybody, be he Jew, Christian, Mohammedan, or Brahman, if he has a spark of modesty left, must feel that it would be nothing short of a miracle that his own religion alone should be perfect throughout, while that of every other believer should be false and wrong from beginning to end. —Max Müller.

How much are you interested in the individual? How extensiv is the territory you would giv him? Would you limit his life to a few stray chances after you hav yourself fenced in about all the desirable opportunity that exists? Do you aspire to lead the church or to be one to whom it is sufficient to know that it is more honorable to share than to dominate in service? Would you go into politics to run the state or to see that the state is well administered? How much privacy would you leave the soul? How far would you tread beyond the sacred threshold of personality, where inviolacy draws its line of fire? —Horace L. Traubel.

CHRISTIANITY, not manhood, is their pride.
E'en that which from their founder down has spiced
Their superstition with humanity,
'Tis not for its humanity they love it.
No; but because Christ taught, Christ practiced it.
Happy for them he was so good a man!
Happy for them that they can trust his virtue!
His virtue? Not his virtue, but his name,
They say, shall spread abroad, and shall devour
And put to shame the names of all good men.
The name, the name is all their pride.
—Lessing.

HELL—and heaven, too, for that part of it—is based upon the crass ignorance and uncritical credulity of the early monks, and modern intelligence is only now beginning to break the fetters of ancient lies. All, except a valiant few, are the helots of the dead past. The wings of thought are heavy with the dust of the fourth century, and shreds from the gloom of the dark ages still lie athwart the path of modern man. Tens of thousands of living men and women—although the horizon is reddening with the dawn of a better day—still carry on their shoulders the corpses of Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Tertullian, Eusebius, and Augustine.—Saladin.

We believe that not only can good be done but money made by any Liberal who will canvass for our book "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated." In fact we know one man who worked at it but a few hours weekly and sold nearly fifty copies in a month. The price is low; everybody knows the Old Testament stories, and nearly everybody would like a book applying nineteenth-century wit and knowledge to them. People like to laugh. Reverence for the Old Testament tales has largely disappeared and jokes at the expense of Jonah and Joseph and Esau and Samson and David, and the other worthies of unsavory reputation, are keenly appreciated. It seems to us that the book will sell at sight. It does here in the store. Liberals out of employment will find this a good way to make an honest dollar.

LOGIC OF DEATH
—OR,—
Why Should the Atheist Fear to Die?
By J. G. HOLYOAKE. Price, 5 cents

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

A Nineteenth Century Novel.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world.
